*Painting from nature

- Paul Cézanne

Paul Cézanne is widely regarded as one of the greatest painters and renegades in modern art. For Cézanne, color was a means to build voluminous forms rather than airy scenes, as evidenced in his most famous subject: landscapes. In this extraordinary 1862 landscape, Paysage aux environs d'Aix-en-Provence, Cézanne's innovative approach to form is on masterful display.

For the greatest artistic visionaries, home often serves as a sanctuary—a place to retreat and immerse themselves in the landscapes that shaped their identities. For Van Gogh, it was Nuenen, for Picasso, Málaga and for Paul Cézanne, it was Aix-en-Provence, his most enduring motif. Cézanne frequently retreated from Paris to the tranquility of Aix, and his affection for his home is evident in the beautiful simplicity of this scene. He captures the rolling provincial hills in the height of summer with hatched, parallel brushstrokes that would come to define Cézanne's mature career. Though it appears fluid and free, the placement of paint in Cézanne's landscapes is always intentional.

Cézanne portrays Aix as an idyllic, unspoiled landscape, reflecting rural France's intrinsic beauty. The seriousness of the artist's intention is evident in the deeply verdant grass and trees set against a perfect billowing sky, creating a dramatic scene despite the sunny day's serenity. The canvas brilliantly showcases Cézanne's genius—abundant with green and lush texture, his simple yet exceptionally thick application of the paint creates a rich, lifelike composition. It is as if Cézanne was so overwhelmed by the richness of what he saw that he needed more than just his paintbrush to capture it.

Known as the "father of us all" by luminaries such as Henri Matisse and Pablo Picasso, Cézanne's influence was both profound and far-reaching, laying crucial groundwork for Cubism and abstraction to take center stage decades later. Throughout his career, Cézanne maintained relationships with key contemporaries, including Pissarro, Monet and Renoir, yet he always charted his own course, never fully aligning with any one movement.

Every major museum in the Western world has works by Cézanne in their permanent collections and important Aix-en-Provence landscapes are held in the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the Musée d'Orsay. In February of 2024, a previously unknown mural of the Aix landscape was discovered during renovations to Cézanne's home. A total of nine murals, all painted between 1859 and 1869, were transferred to canvases and placed in museums across the globe, including the Petit Palais and Musée d'Orsay, among others. •

In den Landschaften hält Cézanne Zwiesprache mit der Natur, seiner grossen und einzigen Herrin. «Sur le motif», schauend und denkend, denkend und schauend, tagelang, so hält er aus, bis das Bild «steht». Und so fand man ihn, vom Unwetter getroffen, mitten in seiner Landschaft der Provence, kurz vor seinem Tod.

Es ist paradox: Cézanne respektiert mit aller Treue den Landschafts-Tatbestand – «on n'est ni trop scrupuleux, ni trop sincère, ni trop soumis à la nature» – aber das Ergebnis ist alles andere als eine Abbildung, nicht Heimat und nicht Sehnsuchtsbild. Denn was er «sieht», ist nicht Landschaft in ihrer Dinglichkeit und Raumtiefe, und fern sind die Traditionen der Landschaftsmalerei. Er steht mitten im Sturm seiner Eindrücke, «sous le coup de sensations», einer befremdlichen Offenbarung. «Die Landschaft denkt in mir, ich bin ihr Bewusstsein.» In einem langen Prozess ihres Erscheinens bildet sich Landschaft auf der Leinwand, als logisches Strukturwerk aus «taches» und «plans», nicht nach Natur, sondern «parallèle à la nature». Cézanne sieht die Natur «au point du vue du tableau». E.M.

79 PAYSAGE AUX ENVIRONS D'AIX-EN-PROVENCE, circa 1865

Gowing (London): circa 1865
16 x 25½ inches (40.5 x 59.5 cm)

The foreground is of an extremely bright and "troweled" green, and the mountains are of a uniform gray, whereas the lightly clouded sky seems executed with a palette knife. In other places, particularly the foliage and shadows of the very dark trees, the artist appears to have used a small spatula.

In an undated statement, Maxime Conil, husband of the painter's sister Rose, confirms that he presented this canvas "to my friend Henri Boissin around 1885; at that time I did not attach any value to the works of my brother-in-law. I found this one abandoned by Cézanne in a room at the Jas de Bouffan, together with other paintings that my father-in-law [Louis-Auguste Cézanne] destroyed after his son's departure."

Exhibition: Royal Academy of Arts, London, and traveling, 1988–89, No. 11, ill.

Provenance: Jas de Bouffan, Aix-en-Provence; Henri Boissin, Aix-en-Provence (gift of Maxime Conil, Cézanne's brother-in-law, circa 1885); Mme Marquette, née Boissin (his daughter); Mme Bachollet, née Marquette (her daughter), Paris; sale, Sotheby's, London, Dec. 1, 1982, No. 8, ill. 80 PAIN ET GIGOT D'AGNEAU, circa 1865

Venturi (65): 1865–67; V. revised: 1866–67; Gowing (London): circa 1866
10½ x 14 inches (27 x 35.5 cm)

One of the first works in which Cézanne combines strong and contrasting colors with the palette-knife technique, a radical departure from the use of a brush. Pigments are applied with a flexible spatula, which usually spreads them on larger areas and with less attention to detail.

Gowing wrote that Cézanne's purpose here had been "to unmask the essential brutality and coarseness of painting as with a murderous weapon.... The subject here and the unremitting style were equally foreign to French painting. The Goya Still Life with a Sheep's Head, which identified butchery as a savage decapitation, entered the Louvre thirty-one years after Cézanne's death. It was Cézanne as much as Goya who decided that the art of the frightful age to come should not shrink from the violence inseparable from the propensities and the imaginings of mankind. In Cézanne's maturity the grievous dilemma was made good" (Gowing [exh. cat.], 1988–89).

But brutality and coarseness do not seem to be the only surprising elements of this work. Could one not see here also a kind of exhilaration, caused by the unusual experience of producing such a sparkling rectangle of crusty paint with colors alone, renouncing lines altogether? And whereas Cézanne never did see Goya's fierce still life, Rembrandt's no less gripping carcass of a suspended ox, in the Louvre since 1857, was obviously familiar to him.

The rough surface resulting from the spatula execution appears to have attracted a good deal of dirt. The dark painting may reveal a richer coloration after a competent cleaning.

81 CRÂNE ET BOUILLOIRE, 1864–65

Venturi (68): 1865–66; V. revised: 1866–67; Rivièrre: circa 1868;
Gowing (London): circa 1868–70
23½ x 18¾ inches (59.5 x 48 cm)

This strange painting assembles elements from various obviously unfinished works; underneath a few clearly discernible objects appear to be the beginnings of other studies. At the left are traces of a blue sky with white clouds of what must have been a horizontal landscape, the major part of which seems to have been painted over. When put on its right side, the canvas reveals above the lower right corner what was possibly the trunk of a brown tree. More important, at the left, and not connected with the rest, is a sketch of the écorché, a white plaster cast still to be found in Cézanne's Lauves studio

(in later years he worked repeatedly from it; see notably Chappuis No. 125B). In front of the central brown skull, powerfully detaching itself from a brown-black background and resting on a brown surface, appears at the right a metal container set against yellow, which is in no way related to the rest.

The original support may have been a brownish gray canvas or a thickly brushed ground of that tint, partly covered by a layer of yellow that shows here and there. On the right and in the lower left corner there are black hatchings not unlike those of the portrait of the artist's sister, No. 119. But below the basis on which rests the skull, across the plaster écorché and touching the kettle, are the black lines of three sides of an elongated rectangle that remains unexplained.

étude préparatoire à l'huile (fig. 13). Cézanne abandonna la version en grand, dont l'idée ambitieuse lui avait certainement été inspirée par Zola au cours des conversations sur l'art qu'ils eurent à Paris, aussi bien que par les audacieuses tentatives qu'il avait vues avec le Déjeuner sur l'herbe de 1863 de Manet (fig. 7) et, plus récemment, la version richement empâtée du Déjeuner sur l'herbe de Monet de 1865-1866 (Musée d'Orsay, Paris) et ses Femmes au jardin commencé en 1866 (Musée Pouchkine, Moscou). Les personnages de Cézanne devaient cependant demeurer essentiellement conceptuels, peints dans l'atelier et à partir de sources visuelles secondaires.

Ce sont les paysages de Cézanne qui allaient être basés sur l'observation directe de la nature, et il devait développer et affiner ses idées à leur sujet en peignant en plein air en compagnie de Pissarro à Auvers et Pontoise au cours des années suivantes. L'Étude : Paysage à Auvers (fig. 14), pour lui donner le titre qu'elle portait lorsqu'il la présenta lors de la première exposition impressionniste de 1874, est typique de cette démarche. Le fait de la qualifier d'étude la place dans la tradition de la peinture fraîche et immédiate en plein air, pratique artistique établie (bien que peu admise dans la théorie académique) depuis le XVIII^e siècle. Il s'agit en fait de l'une des œuvres les plus lyriques de Cézanne au cours de la période d'Auvers, et d'un hommage à l'enseignement de Pissarro.

Ce texte étudie Cézanne en Provence, mais on a consacré quelques lignes à son évolution artistique à Paris, Pontoise et Auvers parce que ce long apprentissage a laissé des traces indélébiles. La croyance en un tempérament personnel, la fidélité à ses propres sensations; un attachement durable à la réaction sensorielle de l'individu devant la nature, prônée par Courbet puis les impressionnistes, la volonté d'observer la nature sans préjugés, l'attitude prudente envers l'art du passé : tout ceci devait réapparaître au cours des dernières années de Cézanne à Aix, lorsque ses avis furent de plus en plus sollicités et enregistrés, et que lui-même prit quelque plaisir à énoncer ses théories. En témoigne une lettre d'Émile Bernard à sa mère lors de sa première rencontre avec Cézanne Pissarro avait enseigné à Cézanne à peindre les tons ou touches de couleurs subtilement mis en œuvre plutôt qu'en modelant la lumière et l'ombre. Cézanne vous remplacez par l'étude des tons le modèle que vous avez dans votre tête comme Cézanne tenta de l'expliquer en juillet 1904.
