1. Lull in operations continues--The continuing lull in enemy operations along the entire front may indicate that the North Korean forces are being disengaged for regrouping before launching further attacks. Many of the invader's best units suffered heavy casualties during the past week and a major reorganization of enemy units may be necessary. Both sides continued probing and patrolling operations, but few troops were engaged. Heaviest action occurred in the east sector, where South Korean units made slight withdrawals from extended positions. UN-US naval airplanes continued to provide close support for ground operations, and air force planes continued to attack enemy equipment, troop concentrations and other targets in rear areas.
