Chemical Society Reviews publishes concise, succinct and lightly referenced articles that provide an introductory overview to topics of current interest in chemistry. The articles appeal to the general research chemist as well as to the expert in the field and provide an essential starting point for further reading. Advanced undergraduates, postgraduates and experienced researchers should all benefit from reading Chemical Society Reviews.

The Editorial Board commissions articles that encourage international, interdisciplinary dialogues in chemical research. The Board welcomes any suggestions for new articles. A guide for authors and synopsis form can be found in the first issue of this year's volume or on the RSC's World-Wide Web home page (URL above). Alternatively, they can be requested from the Managing Editor, in paper or electronic form (postal and e-mail address above).
