

JAFc Thanks Its Reviewers!

The quality and integrity of manuscripts published in JAFc relies on multiple levels of review. This process originates with the authors and coauthors that conduct the work and must attest to its content. The next stop is with the Editors, who must judge whether the manuscript fits within the scope of the journal and adheres to the journal's criteria so that it can undergo a more complete review by peers in the field. It is the latter group upon which we rely for a detailed review of quality, including novelty, clarity, adequacy of methods, interpretation of results, conclusions, and completeness of literature review and comparisons with prior work on related topics. Peer reviewers exercise "quality control" based upon their knowledge and good judgment and must point out clearly any shortcomings and revisions needed for the manuscript to be considered further for publication or be rejected. The editors rely on the peer reviews, and their own reading of the manuscript, in reaching final decisions. Reviewing is an awesome responsibility undertaken willingly by busy people who must set aside for a time their own workload. It is also a professional expectation of scientists who are experts in their fields. It is undertaken anonymously, so one "reward" of reviewing is a sense of doing one's part in advancing science in the fields represented in the manuscript. A recent search for the most cited papers published in JAFc over the past 5 years revealed that a high number of the corresponding authors are regular reviewers for JAFc. One might venture to say that reviewing keeps scientific professionals connected to the cutting edge of research in their fields.

JAFc takes this opportunity to recognize and thank the nearly 5300 scientists who reviewed manuscripts in 2011, covering the gamut of agricultural and food chemistry and its contributing sciences, and representing virtually all parts of the world.

With Our Gratitude,
James N. Seiber
Editor
