

promise is conditioned and dependent upon the use of the article in the manner, quantity, and under the conditions prescribed by the manufacturer, and, when not so used, then such promise is not implied. It appeared that the defendant railway company's general manager had been informed before the contract was made that the seller claimed that two applications were necessary. It was held that there was no implied warranty that one application would suffice, and the fact that the defendant's other representatives, those to whose judgment and discretion the purchase of the "dinamine" was committed, did not have this information imparted to them by the general manager did not alter the situation. Evidence, therefore, that such representatives were not so informed, and would not have made the purchase had they known that two applications were necessary, was not material. Judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed.

OIL OF PEPPERMINT.

Weather conditions during the early spring and throughout the summer were extremely favorable, and a thorough canvass made by our representative in producing districts early in June showed an increase of over 3,600 acres over the acreage of 1913.

Throughout the season the peppermint plants looked very promising, and the distilling was begun as early as the latter part of June, which is quite unusual. It furthermore developed that the yield was exceptionally large and averaged at least 30 pounds of oil per acre, generally more, and, in consequence, a production of between 550,000 and 600,000 pounds of oil has to be reckoned with this year, while the annual consumption is estimated to amount to about one-half of this quantity.

Stocks of old oil were nearly exhausted before the new crop could be marketed, and during the months of May and June the high price of $4.25 per lb. was reached. As soon as the new oil was available a rapid decline took place, until the present values prevailed.

The export demand, on account of the European war, being very small only, and, on account of business conditions in general, it would not be surprising if the declining tendency which has so far prevailed would continue, and unless next year's crop should prove to be an entire failure, it is reasonable to assume that peppermint oil may be bought at moderate figures for some time to come.

Since the high prices which prevailed during the last few years enabled the farmers to take better care of their fields, the quality of this year's oil was generally found to be excellent.—From Advance Circular, Fritzsche Brothers.
