The Mechanisms of Pain and Analgesic Compounds

This symposium will integrate and correlate the current knowledge of pain and analgesia with developing trends in biomedical research. Highlights of current clinical and laboratory studies of neurophysiological models of pain, the biochemical basis of pain, endogenous substances with analgesic action and the outlook for the development of new analgesic compounds will be presented. The topics to be discussed reflect a current surge of interest in pain and its relief and will appeal to many investigators involved in neurochemical, pharmacological and clinical research.
