

S. H. BRAUND

*nam si discedas, laqueo tenet ambitiosi
consuetudo mali, tenet insanabile multos
scribendi cacoethes et aegro in corde senescit.*

This “well-known textual crux”¹ has elicited two responses from editors. Jahn and Mayor delete line 51, which is omitted in L², and Jahn emends ambitiosi to ambitosum, writing “ambitiosi PSω, quod a correctore illatum est, postquam 51, quem spurium iudico, additus est.” The other position is that of Housman, Clausen, and Courtney, who delete laqueo—mali.

Housman’s note constitutes a convenient starting-point: “prorsus intolerabiliter primum uniuerse, qui a scribendi opere discedunt, consuetudine mali teneri dicuntur, deinde, quod minus est, multi teneri scribendi κακοήθει, hoc est eadem illa consuetudine. uerba consuetudo mali unde uenerint demonstrat Σ cacoethes sic interpretatus, mali mores uel mala consuetudo scribendi: praeterea interpolatori displicuisse potest numeri, quae uidebatur, in discedas et multos inaequalitas. ea uero nulla est, cum hoc dicatur: si discedimus (id enim significat secunda subiunctiui persona, sicut x 204 sq. si coneris positum est pro si conatur quicumque senex), multos e nobis tenet cacoethes scribendi et eo, unde fugimus, reducit.” Housman here makes two objections to these lines as they stand and combats a third objection by asserting the soundness of his own reading. His first objection, which is almost certainly valid, is to the repetition of the same point; it is this weak reiteration which has provoked deletion of either lines 50b–51a or line 51.

The present writer likewise accepts Housman’s second point, that the phrase consuetudo mali derives from Σ’s overliteral (and erroneous) explication of cacoethes.³ Further objections to 51a can be marshalled: the apparently unparalleled use of mali after consuetudo,⁴ and the fact

I should like to thank Prof. E. J. Kenney for helpful suggestions on an earlier draft of this paper; all responsibility is, of course, my own.

¹C. O. Brink, Horace on Poetry: The ‘Ars Poetica’ (Cambridge 1971) ad Ars 447.

²Neither are any scholia on the words and phrases in 51 recorded.

³Compare Σ’s similar gloss on trechedipna, 3.67. The only possible defence of consuetudo mali is that it constitutes a kind of word play with cacoethes, cf. F. Jacoby, Hermes 87 (1959) 456.

that malum is not used in the singular by Juvenal to mean “evil-doing” or “misdeed.”⁵

But on the third point, retention of 51b, the present writer dissents. Whether we follow Housman in referring discedas and multos to the first person plural or Courtney in referring the words to the third person plural, multos does seem to distort, if not conflict with, the indefinite, generalising singular discedas.⁶ Moreover, a contrast is apparently created between those who successfully leave off and those who are ensnared, a contrast which does not contribute to the argument. Peter Green’s Penguin version reproduces the correct sense of Juvenal’s argument: “You can’t get out, you’re hooked/By writer’s itch.” The inept multos should be viewed as an interpolation, attributable to the mistaken feeling that tenet lacked an object, mistaken because te may be inferred from discedas.

To complete the objections to 51b, insanabile is, properly speaking, an inappropriate adjective for cacoethes which denotes “a malignant but not incurable growth or ulcer” (Courtney;⁷ my italics). Therefore, although at first sight perhaps an apposite adjective to qualify cacoethes, insanabile may well be an interpolation inspired by the medical metaphor.⁸

Deletion of line 51 has now been argued on several grounds. Retention of 50b may be defended on the ground that laqueo suits the image latent in tenet, which would otherwise remain undeveloped.⁹ However, deletion ⁵In the singular it denotes an illness at 6.109 and “hardship” at 14.290. In the plural, mala usually means “hardships,” “misfortunes” (10.98, 191, 13.13, 14.303, 15.142) and once, in a spurious line, mali means “bad men” (13.236); it occurs three times meaning “wickedness,” but qualified by a genitive (mala nequitiae 14.216 and longae pacis mala 6.292) or in an adjectival phrase (6.336 intacta malis).

⁶E. Paratore, Archaeologia Classica 25–26 (1973–4) 498, makes this point, although he argues (unconvincingly) for a different reading of these lines. See Madvig, *Lat. Gramm.*³ § 370 for this usage and in particular the significance of the subjunctive; also Munro ad Lucr. 1.327 and Mayor ad Juv. 10.339–340 for further parallels. Of these Juv. 10.205, 339, and 340 are closely analogous to the present passage in that despite the shift from 2nd to 3rd person verb, the main sentence requires implicit reference to the unexpressed tu of the subordinate clause. On the moods of the verbs see J. B. Hofmann in Stolz-Schmalz, Lateinische Grammatik (Munich 1928 2.2 p. 774 § 337. For the shift here, cf. lines 39–40.

⁷He cites Celsus 5.28.2, a text quite possibly known to Juvenal. In support of this is the concordance of, e.g., Sat. 1.143–144 with Celsus 2.17.2; for other analogues with Celsus see Courtney’s notes on 4.56, 5.24, 5.32, 6.469, and 14.57.

⁸J. G. Griffith, Festschrift Bruno Snell (Munich 1956) 104 n. 2, makes points in favour of and against the authenticity of insanabile.

⁹For teneo + laqueus cf. Cic. Mil. 40; De Orat. 1.43; Ovid Met. 11.73–74; Sen. Ben. 7.4.1. For the metaphorical use of laqueus, cf. Hor. C. 3.24.8 mortis laqueis; Apul. Met. 10.24.2 crudelissimis laqueis mortis insidiari; 24.5 laqueos insidiarum; 27.3 laqueis fraudium pessimorum; with reference to forms of writing and discourse, as here, cf. Cic.

of line 51 creates a problem: the adjective ambitosi qualifying the gerund scribendi seems problematical.¹⁰ This problem is avoided by Jahn, who emends to ambitosum to agree with cacoethes. This is a plausible solution, although "the ambitious ulcer of writing holds (you) in a snare" is a more strained and less effective application of ambitosus than its other occurrence in Juvenal, at 3.182, hic uiuimus ambitiosa/paupertate omnes.

A better solution arises from considering other meanings of ambitosus. "Ambitious" seems to relate via "importunate" to the literal sense of the adjective, "going around, winding, clinging." The noun most appropriately qualified thus is laqueo, the snare which encircles the victim. Hence I propose emendation to ambitoso. Both "ambitious" and "encircling" are appropriate here and neither meaning should be rejected, this being another case in which Juvenal exploits ambivalence.¹¹ Ambitoso qualifies the rather bald laqueo and creates a neat ablative phrase in a common disposition of noun + adjective,¹² a disposition, moreover, which encircles the word tenet!¹³

The literal meaning of ambitosus is recognised in only two places in Latin literature,¹⁴ Plin. H.N. 5.71 Iordanes amnis . . . quatenus locorum situs patitur, ambitosus and Hor. C. 1.36.20 nec Damalis nouo/diuellit

Caec. 83 aequitatem rei uerbi laqueo capi; De Orat. 1.43 Stoici . . . disputationum suarum atque interrogationum laqueis te inretitum tenerent; Plin. Ep. 1.5.7 nec me laqueis tam insidiosae interrogationis inuolueram; Gell. 1.2.4 sylogismorum captionumque dialecticarum laqueis strepebat, etc.

¹⁰One would expect an adverb to qualify a verbal noun: see E. C. Woodhouse, A New Latin Syntax (London 1959) § 201.

¹¹For similar ambivalence cf. intestata senectus at 1.144, where intestata bears the meaning "unattested" (for argumentation see Housman, CR 13 [1899] 432–434 = Collected Classical Papers 489–491), an exceedingly rare usage (TLL 7,2.4.75–81 cites only Aug. Civ. 20.30 p. 480 27 D besides this passage), but nevertheless, I would argue, with just a glance towards the regular meaning "intestate" (Plautus' pun on the word at Curc. 622 suggests that the Romans were aware of the multivalence of the word).

Other cases where Juvenal creates ambivalence with rare and regular senses of a word include farrago 1.86; municeps 4.33, 14.271; manipli 8.153; collega 8.197. Attonitae at 7.67 is multivalent (see Courtney).

There may be a similar ambiguity at Tac. Hist. 2.92—adbitis pecuniis per occultos aut ambitiosos sinus—where, although ambitosos sinus clearly stands for sinus ambitiosorum (= "ambitious"), there may be a hint of the sense "winding" in view of the mention of secrecy in occultos. (I am grateful to Mr J. D. Cloud for suggesting this line of enquiry and the parallel example of 1.144.)

¹²Cf., e.g., 40, 49, 112, 8.28 patriae contingis ouanti, 8.154, 8.235 tunica punire molesta, and many examples which feature adjective + noun with the noun second. See further C. Conrad, HSCP 69 (1965) 195–258 esp. 203–207; T. E. V. Pearce, CQ n.s. 16 (1966) 140–171 and 298–320.

¹³The notion of encircling/clinging is frequently found in association with laqueus but expressed by other adjectives such as artus and tenax: e.g., Cic. Verr. 2.1.13, Plin. Ep. 2.8.2, Sen. Phoen. 148, Quint. 5.10.101, Man. 5.186, Sen. Phaedr. 1085–1086, Symph. 252, Ovid Met. 11.252.

adultero/lasciuus hederis ambitiosior. In their note on the latter passage, Nisbet and Hubbard refer to Ars Poetica 447 f., a passage which has more relevance to the present context than has formerly been realised. Horace is describing the criticism of poetry by the uir bonus et prudens (Ars 445): ambitiosa recidet/ornamenta. Nisbet and Hubbard write “in view of recidet there must be a suggestion of the twining tendril” and Brink ad loc., with more circumspection, “ambitiosa perhaps reveals the notion ‘encircling and luxuriant growth,’ once the following word recidet opens up the horticultural image,” adducing C. 1.36.20 and D. West’s elucidation of the sustained metaphor from pruning in lines 445–448.¹⁵ Both Horace and Juvenal use ambitiosus ambivalently, in similar contexts of poetic composition, to connote encircling as well as ambition. The possibility that Juvenal is alluding to these two passages of Horace would support the interpretation of ambitiosus in its literal sense here.¹⁶ This possibility is in turn supported by the high level of Horatian allusion in this part of the Satire.¹⁷

¹⁶The amatory context of C. 1.36.20 seems relevant too: Juvenal’s wording suggests the analogy of poet and lover (cf. Hor. Serm. 2.1.10 amor scribendi, Ep. 2.1.108–109), an analogy made more explicit later when Statius’ Thebaid is called his amica and he is compelled to prostitute his Agave (82–87: for explication see N. Rudd, Lines of Enquiry [Cambridge 1976] 101–102; V. Tandoi, “Il ricordo di Stazio ‘dolce poeta’ nella Sat. 7 di Giovenale,” Maia 21 [1969] 103–122 = Omaggio a E. Fraenkel [Pisa 1968] 248–270). Both lover and poet are completely hooked by the objects of their passions: for this type of expression in the context of love cf., e.g., Lucilius 990 M sic laqueis, manicis, pedicis, mens inrestita est; Tib. 1.9.46 poteram ad laqueos cautior esse tuos; Ovid A.A. 1.646 in laqueos quos posuere cadant with A. S. Hollis ad loc., Apul. Met. 2.5 serit blanditias, inuadit spiritum, amoris profundi pedicis aeternis alligat; for Greek examples see Marx on Lucilius 990.

¹⁷Allusions to the lyrics are especially thick here (Rudd [above, n. 16] 96–97 notices some of them). This is appropriate: it is important for Juvenal’s argument that he evoke Horace at the height of his lyric powers, just as he proceeds to evoke Virgil at the height of his epic powers in lines 66–67. The most explicit allusions are uena 53: 2.18.9 (see Nisbet-Hubbard); fontibus Aonidum 59: 3.4.25, the same context of poetic inspiration; sub antro/Pierio 59–60: 3.4.40, cf. 2.1.39; thyrsus 60: 2.19.8; euhoe 62: 2.19.5, 7 (evidently a quotation); for the combination of cave and Bacchic context cf. 3.25 esp. 1–4. Less fixed and exclusive allusions lie in the connotations of uates 53; the claim to originality at 53 ff.; deducere 54 referring to poetic composition; and the notion that the woods are the poet’s retreat, all of which find analogues in Horace.

The allusion to the close of the Ars is also in keeping with other similar allusions here, e.g., 52 recalls Ars 453–455 ut mala quem scabies aut morbus regius urget/aut fanaticus error et iracunda Diana, /uesanum tetigisse timent fugientque poetam (evocation of the mad poet is not, after all, without ironical point); 53 apparently alludes to Ars 409–410, as Nisbet and Hubbard observe on C. 2.18.9, in the reference of uena to poetic inspiration. The culmination of Juvenal’s allusions to Horace obviously lies in the explicit reference of 62.

Finally, the corruption from ambitoso to ambitosi is easily accounted for. Scribes often made adjectives agree with whatever substantive was nearest,¹⁸ which would explain the corruption if scribendi were the next word (i.e., before interpolation of 51); even mali in the spurious line could have affected the ending of ambitoso. Failure to appreciate the literal sense of ambitosus could also have influenced its corruption into agreement with a noun more likely to be described as “ambitious.”

The reading of lines 50–52 proposed here—

nam si discedas, laqueo tenet ambitioso
scribendi cacoethes et aegro in corde senescit

—not only resolves the textual crux but illustrates Juvenal’s poetic powers, appropriately in this context of poetic inspiration. For along with the rare literal sense of ambitosus comes the unparalleled metaphorical use of cacoethes; senesco too bears an unusual, transferred sense, “to endure to old age,” paralleled in its application to disease only in Seneca (Ep. 98.15, of an ulcer, a passage possibly known to Juvenal). Juvenal is in effect showing off in this part of the poem, running through the whole gamut of metaphors and clichés for poetic activity and inspiration: ploughing the dust and/or sand (48–49); the uena of metal and/or water (53); weaving (54); and minting coins (55). In lines 50–52 Juvenal describes the impulse to write poetry in an extravagant mixture of metaphors¹⁹ taken from the realms of disease and trapping.

¹⁸See J. Willis, Latin Textual Criticism (Urbana 1972) 217, citing Stat. Th. 6.296–297. The ease of corruption of this sort is illustrated by the textual variants at 3.128, the other occurrence of ambitosus in Juvenal: ambitiosa Φ: ambitosi P (U. Knoche, D. Iunius Iuvenalis Saturae [Munich 1950] also records ambitiose γ¹), ambitosi here with uiuius, as if the copyist read no further than the end of the line.

¹⁹Courtney’s argument for Housman’s deletion of laqueo—mali on the grounds that “otherwise we have an intolerable mixed metaphor (laqueo and cacoethes),” like his attempt to regiment into consistency the farrago of metaphors of 53–55, suggests a lack of appreciation of Juvenal’s penchant for playful extravagance in word and image.
