

USING WATER "UNCHASTELY": CICERO PRO CAELIO 34 AGAIN—ADDENDUM

JAMES L. BUTRICA

IN BUTRICA 1999 I ARGUED, in response to Bruun 1997, that the use of water by women for douching after sexual intercourse was well enough attested that the words given to Appius Claudius at Cael. 34, ideo aquam adduxi, ut ea tu incede uterere? ("Did I bring water for you to use it unchastely?"), can be understood without resort to Bruun's suggestion that Cicero is characterizing Clodia as a prostitute by alluding to an illegal use of water by certain Roman brothels.

At the time, however, I was unaware of the evidence for a special connection between prostitutes and the use of water. This is the word aquariolus, defined in the OLD as "a servant who supplied washing-water for prostitutes." The ancient source for this definition is Paulus: aquarioli dicebantur mulierum impudicarum sordidi adseculae (p. 22M). Apuleius uses the word as a generic insult against a cuckold who, even worse, is alleged to assist in his wife's infidelities (Apol. 78.1: aquariolus iste uxoris suae). There is a further echo of the concept, though not the word itself, in the Historia Augusta, where it is said of Commodus that, among other forms of low behaviour, he aquam gessit ut lenonum minister (Comm. 2.9).¹ This should occasion no surprise; if water was essential for douching after intercourse, a brothel would obviously have an especially urgent need for a constant and reliable supply, and it should be no more surprising that the slaves who toted the water acquired a special title. But the existence of the aquarioli as a distinct group also suggests another possible dimension to Cicero's prosopopoeia of App. Claudius. When Cicero has him ask, "Did I bring water [aquam adduxi] for you to use it unchastely?," we are perhaps to understand, "Did you think I was your aquariolus when I built the Aqua Appia?"
