

DORYPHORAE IN CURTIUS 3.3.15

Q. Curtius Rufus, describing the order of the Persian march, writes: Doryphorae vocabantur proximum his (i. e., the 'king's kinsmen') agmen, soliti vestem excipere regalem; hi currum regis antebant, quo ipse eminens vehebatur (3.3.15). Spearman (or, more properly, 'Bodyguards') who looked after the king's wardrobe? J. Mützell objected: "... das Geschäft, welches den Doryphoren beigelegt wird, paßt weder zu ihrem Namen, noch zu den sonstigen Nachrichten über ihre Dienstpflichten"<sup>1)</sup>. The manuscript reading is clearly corrupt, but even the imaginative text of E. Hedicke (2nd ed., Stuttgart, 1908) had no solution to the peculiar phrase, soliti vestem excipere regalem (an expression without parallel and elucidated only by J. Freinshem's comments<sup>2)</sup>), which demeans the Doryphoroi. Furthermore, Mützell rightly remarks: "vorausgesetzt auch, daß ihnen jenes Geschäft zukam, so verdiente es doch nicht hier besonders hervorgehoben zu werden ..."<sup>3)</sup>. J. E. Atkinson seeks support in Herakleides of Kyme (FGrHist 689 F 1 = Athen. 12.514 B), concludes that "Curtius may be correct in attributing to them care of the royal robes" and suggests a dramatic link in Curtius' narrative with 3.11.11 and 3.12.5<sup>4)</sup>. But the argument is not persuasive, and one suspects that Atkinson has his misgivings.

I suggest a relatively simple emendation, which may return to the Doryphoroi a measure of dignity: soliti (ad) vest (ibulum) excubare regale. This would bring the bodyguards of Dareios in line with the Macedonian groups in Curtius who are entrusted with custodia corporis. Cf. cohors quoque, quae excubabat ad tabernaculum regis (3.12.3, pueri regii); per hos imperatum ut, qui ad praetorium excubabant, armati vigilarent (6.8.17, hypaspistai, sometimes called doryphoroi); Ptolomaeum et Leonmatum excubantes ad cubiculi limen (8.6.22, somatophylakes). The phrase ad vestibulum excubare regale (or possibly regiae)<sup>5)</sup> would be a variant on the above-mentioned examples. It would also be in keeping with the role of the Doryphoroi in this procession, the guard preceding the king's chariot<sup>6)</sup>.
