THE CONGO--1960

The post-independence collapse of authority in the Belgian Congo, in July 1960, made it necessary for the Joint Chiefs of Staff to extend the scope of their active interest in the region. Until then their interests and activities had been confined to participating in the review of policy proposals. The mid-summer crisis gave them, however, the additional responsibility of actively directing a large-scale logistical effort in support of a major military operation by the United Nations.

Early in the year, the gradual transfer of sovereign rights planned for the Congo by the Belgian Government had been impatiently swept aside by the African leaders. At the round-table conference in Brussels in January and February 1960, the Congolese delegates had presented a common front in their desire for immediate independence, no matter how divided they were on other issues. Accepting the inevitable, the Belgian Government had agreed in the course of the conference to grant the Congo its independence on 30 June and to hold a Congo-wide Parliamentary election at the end of May. Squalls appeared on the political horizon almost at once. Of the seven major "parties" in the Congo, none gained enough seats in the election to assure it of even 30 percent of the votes in the Chamber of Representatives. Patrice Lumumba, whose MNC party won some 38 of the 137 seats, emerged as leader of the largest single bloc. The Abako, under Joseph Kasavubu, the Conakat party of Katanga, led by Moise Tshombe, and a dissident wing of the MNC led by Albert Kalondji in Kasai

Province, together garnered about 27 votes, but were allied chiefly by their growing opposition to a tightly centralized, unitary type of government. (2) On the basis of the MNC Party's weak victory in the May elections, the Belgian Resident Minister authorized Mr. Lumumba to seek out the possibilities of forming a government. Nearly two weeks of political bickering and maneuvering followed. Unable to persuade Mr. Kasavubu and his followers to participate in Lumumba's efforts to form a government, the Resident Minister withdrew his authorization and offered it to Kasavubu. Now it was Lumumba's turn to react. Bitterly assailing the Belgian Minister, Mr. Lumumba immediately declared that he and his followers would not cooperate in any arrangement with Mr. Kasavubu. (3) Four days later, the New York Times reported, however, that on the previous day, 20 June, Mr. Lumumba had conferred with the other Congolese leaders and that a "deal" was apparently taking shape whereby Mr. Lumumba would head the Government as Premier and Mr. Kasavubu would become Chief of State. On the day after the meeting, the Lumumba bloc mustered 74 votes--a clear majority--in the Chamber of Representatives on a roll-call to elect a presiding officer. A few hours later, after discussing the vote with Kasavubu, the Belgian Resident Minister withdrew the latter's mission to form a government and offered the Premiership to Lumumba, who, in accepting it, expressed his hope "for sincere friendship and economic co-operation with Belgium." at all to the liking of Kalondji's followers. "Several thousand" of them, while Kasavubu was being installed as Chief of State, demonstrated before the Parliament Building, demanding the inclusion of their leader in the new government. (5)

Further demonstrations, street fights, rioting and tribal clashes in the interior punctuated the independence celebrations, which began on Wednesday, 29 June, and continued over the following week-end.

Congolese officials, undoubtedly with some justification, at first ascribed the rioting to nothing more than frayed tempers or an excess of exuberance. Greater importance was attached to the clashes in the provinces between tribal groups. On the occasion of the signing of a treaty of friendship and collaboration with Belgium, on 29 June, Premier Lumumba was reported to have asked the Belgian commander of the Force Publique to take firm action to control the situation, particularly in Kasai Province where the threat was considered to be especially serious. The next day Lumumba introduced a disconcerting element into the official ceremonies and abruptly transformed their atmosphere by delivering a militant speech in which he recited the sufferings of the Africans at the hands of the whites. place between troops and tribesmen in Coquilhatville, in Equator Province about 400 miles northeast of Leopoldville, during a demonstration that had its origins in economic discontent and a consequent demand for self-rule. Firing into the crowd, the troops killed ten people and wounded more than twenty. News of the affair sparked another outbreak of street fighting in Leopoldville, and at this point the American Ambassador, Clare L. Timberlake, who had arrived less than a week before, warned that Americans might have to be evacuated. Armed patrols quickly restored order in the capital and Ambassador Timberlake shortly decided not to put his warning into effect, at least for the time being. (7) On Wednesday, 6 July, the ominous report reached Leopoldville that mutinous elements of the Force Publique at Thysville, about 80 miles to the southwest, had disarmed and locked up their Belgian officers. Although crowds, described as "somewhat argumentative," gathered in the African quarters and a demonstration by about 200 soldiers took place in front of the Parliament Building, Leopoldville remained calm. But calm suddenly gave way to panic early on Friday morning, 8 July, when refugees began pouring into the city with stories of rape and looting by the mutineers in the outlying districts. As the troops in Leopoldville rose against their officers and joined the mobs in the streets, white residents took shelter in their embassies or fled across the river to Brazzaville in the French Congo. Before the day was over, the American Embassy was surrounded by an angry crowd, river crossings to Brazzaville had been closed off, and communication with the outside had been cut. Public order and authority appeared to have completely broken down. (8)

Concern for the safety of American citizens in the Congo compelled the United States Government to take official cognizance of the situation. State Department estimates placed the number of Americans in the entire area at 347, of whom about 80 had taken refuge in the Embassy compound in Leopoldville. (9) The Washington Liaison Group, the interdepartmental agency that was responsible for the general supervision of evacuation plans and on which the Joint Chiefs of Staff were represented by the Chief of the Joint Intelligence Objectives Agency, had been closely following the developments of the week-end in the Congo and had suggested to the Operations Directorate (J-3) of the Joint Staff that the armed services might soon be called on for assistance in an evacuation operation. When, after the menacing events of the preceding days, communications between Washington and Leopoldville were severed on the morning of Friday, 8 July, the Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs, Mr. Joseph C. Satterthwaite, decided that American citizens must be evacuated. (10)

Later the same morning, Rear Admiral Frank O'Beirne, Director, J-3, established a two-man "task force" in the Joint War Room to serve as an information center and to coordinate requests for assistance. As the scope of the Congo operations broadened, the task force expanded in numbers and function. Reaching a peak strength of five officers, including representatives of the Logistics Directorate, it acted, and was sometimes referred to, as a Battle Staff, directing the activities of USCINCEUR for J-3 in the name of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The problem of providing transport facilities and whatever security might be required for an evacuation operation did not at first put any great tax on available resources. Indications were that the few Americans believed to be in the Congo could be taken to some temporary safe haven beyond the frontiers, such as Brazzaville, Accra or Luanda, and that it would not be necessary for them to leave the continent. As soon as he established radio communication with Washington on 8 July, by way of Brazzaville and Paris, Ambassador Timberlake reported that the immediate need was for helicopters and light planes to bring Americans in from the outlying areas. The J-3 "task force" at once arranged with USCINCEUR for three helicopters from Germany and one from Wheelus Field, Tripoli, to be flown to Brazzaville in C-124 transports. The first one arrived the next day and the others followed soon afterward. The four transport planes and another that had been sent on ahead as a "pilot" plane were placed under the "operational control," of the Ambassador for evacuation flights, and three attache aircraft in neighboring countries were made available for the same use if needed. []

The decision to evacuate Americans from the Congo and the preparations to this end led in turn to the possibility of further, more burdensome levies on American military resources. []

[] The first information received in the Joint Staff on 8 July indicated that the State Department had accepted responsibility for evacuating all Europeans and that MATS would have to be drawn upon for additional planes. In previous instances elsewhere, the State Department had placed transport requirements directly on the Air Force, which in turn had levied directly on MATS, but it was the view of the JCS representative in the Washington Liaison Group that the Congo problem called for the evaluation and coordination of such requirements by the Joint War Room task force. the weekend of 9 July rioting and rapine continued to spread in the Congo, while at the same time the military transports and helicopters that were arriving appeared to be more than adequate for American evacuation needs. Consequently, when the French Government requested aid in evacuating French nationals, the State Department on 11 July agreed that any space available in Embassy-controlled aircraft after American nationals were accommodated would be offered to Europeans. Meanwhile, however, the Belgian airline Sabena had diverted its entire fleet to the Congo and Air France was re-routing planes into Brazzaville. The availability of commercial transportation and the arrival of rapidly increasing numbers of American military aircraft on the new and different mission of providing airlift for a United Nations force virtually eliminated the possibility that additional requirements would be placed on the Air Force for evacuation purposes. After making the initial evacuation arrangements, the Joint Staff, which was becoming involved in the new task, was only occasionally concerned with evacuation measures. 1-5

That American armed forces might be called upon to restore order in the Congo was also to be considered. On Friday, 8 July, when the disintegration of the Force Publique removed the major safeguard of public order, the Belgian Government took immediate steps to reinforce the 2,500 Belgian soldiers that had remained in the Congo. Two companies of paratroopers arrived from Belgium over the weekend, additional troops moved in from the neighboring trust territory of Ruanda-Urundi, and preparations to send further reinforcements from Belgium were announced. But the arrival of the Belgian troops merely added fuel to the fire. Although the Congolese

Foreign Minister, Justin Bomboko, was reported to have asked for Belgian intervention, the Premier, Patrice Lumumba, quickly denounced it as a violation of the recently concluded treaty. On Tuesday, 12 July, serious fighting took place between the Belgian forces and units of the Force Publique at Matadi and Boma, near the Belgian base at Kitona, on the lower Congo River. Adding to the chaos and intensifying the anti-Belgian animosity in the province of Leopoldville, Governor Moise Tshombe of Katanga had in the meantime declared his intention of seceding from the Leopoldville government and of setting up a fully independent state. He had further indicated that Katanga would welcome Belgian military aid. (16)

In the course of these developments, officials of the Congolese Government had approached Ambassador Timberlake with an invitation for American assistance []

The Congolese Government had also requested help from the United Nations, Secretary of State Herter disclosed at a meeting with Admiral Burke, Acting Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and Defense Department representatives on Tuesday, 12 July. He had already talked with the President and with Mr. Dag Hammarskjold, Secretary General of the United Nations, Mr. Herter said, and he believed that American troops should not be sent to the Congo "unless they were absolutely essential to save lives." The United Nations, he continued, should provide the necessary troops and military advisors, preferably French-speaking African troops. The possibility of a temporary joint command was then discussed. Admiral Burke expressed the view that if such a command were established it should be a United Nations command and that American forces should not be placed under either Belgian or Congolese command. Admiral Burke agreed that the "most logical" course would be to provide logistical support for contingents furnished by other African states rather than sending American troops at this time. (19) Later in the afternoon, the Joint Chiefs met to the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to Secretary of State Herter, the Deputy Secretary of Defense assured Secretary Herter that he concurred with the latter's suggestion concerning the desirability of the United Nations acting on the problem.

The Deputy Secretary of Defense also informed Secretary Herter that steps to meet the threatened food shortage in Leopoldville had been taken. In his telephone message that morning, Ambassador Timberlake had expressed particular concern about the flour supply, stating that an urgent need existed for one hundred tons of "hard winter wheat flour." At Secretary Herter's mid-day conference with Admiral Burke and the Secretary of Defense's representatives it had been decided that the Joint Chiefs would tell USCINCEUR to be ready to ship the flour promptly, by air, but not to make actual shipment without further direction. A message to this effect was dispatched to USCINCEUR late Tuesday evening, with the request that the Joint Chiefs be notified as soon as possible if it appeared necessary to call on MATS for additional aircraft. At this point, the tempo and volume of activity rose sharply and did not begin to diminish for several weeks. As to the flour shipment, complications developed almost immediately. USCINCEUR had at first replied that the shipment could begin within twelve hours, if directed, but an exchange of messages and telephone conversations on Wednesday morning, 13 July, disclosed that no hard winter wheat flour was available in the European Theater -- only American standard issue flour, the suitability of which was in question. Although the Deputy Secretary of Defense had apparently understood from the discussion with Secretary Herter, the day before, that the shipment could be made from Lome, Togoland, this information had not yet reached the Joint War Room. on 13 July, Rear Admiral E.B. Grantham, in charge of African Affairs for the Assistant Secretary of Defense (ISA), called a conference of the appropriate Joint Staff, Service and State Department representatives to discuss the various requests that were pouring in. USCINCEUR had raised the question whether aviation gasoline would have to be sent to airfields in the Congo and had reported that the Belgian Government proposed to ask logistical support for the airlift of troops; Ambassador Timberlake had put in a request for Air Force operations and survival personnel and for communications equipment and technicians to be sent to the Kamina airfield; the Department of Defense itself had reopened the question of sending military attaches to the Congo. At the meeting with Admiral Grantham it was determined that the only logistical support authorized was that required to help evacuate Americans;

none would be furnished the Belgian military forces except as part of a United Nations effort. The State Department representative soon afterward cleared up the remaining points. The hundred tons of flour were to come from Togoland; no aviation gasoline was to be shipped at this time; the appointment of three, French-speaking attaches (one from each Service) was approved; and the movement, upon "valid request" by the Ambassador, of communications equipment and technical personnel, but not of operations or survival personnel, was authorized. No sooner had these questions been disposed of than the J-3 Battle Staff received a telephone call from Paris with the information that the American Ambassador in Brussels had asked USCINCEUR whether 1800 tons of foodstuffs could be provided and transported to the Congo, beginning the following day and continuing at a rate of 180 tons daily for ten days. USCINCEUR reported, however, that the aircraft available in the theater would be sufficient only for the first two daily movements and suggested that MATS be brought in on the third day to complete the requirement by flights from the continental United States by way of the South Atlantic route. Nothing that the aircraft and equipment desired by the Belgian Government were available in the European Theater and that aviation fuel was on hand at Dakar and Accra, the Joint Chiefs dispatched a memorandum to the Secretary of Defense expressing their belief that "prompt action" to restore order in the Congo was "mandatory and in the best interests of the United States." [

On the same day, 13 July, Secretary-General Hammarskjold convened the Security Council of the United Nations to consider the Congolese request for aid, which he recommended be given through the medium of a United Nations emergency force, similar to the one that had been created in the Palestine crisis. A resolution introduced by the Tunisian representative, calling for the withdrawal of Belgian troops and authorizing the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps to provide military aid until such time as the Congolese Government could fully meet its national security tasks, was adopted in the early morning hours of 14 July. The Belgian representative expressed his Government's willingness to withdraw its troops upon introduction of a United Nations force and to cooperate fully with the United Nations. Calling attention to the statement of the Belgian Government and assuring the Security Council that the United States stood ready to respond to "any reasonable United Nations request in the fields of transportation and communications," Ambassador Lodge announced that the United States Government voted for the resolution, but with the express understanding that the withdrawal of Belgian troops was contingent upon the successful provision of United Nations aid. (25)

~~TOP SECRET~~ (S) (NOFORN)

(25) Dept of State Bulletin, vol XLIII, No. 1101, 1 Aug 60, pp. 159-161.

As soon as the Congo problem became a United Nations responsibility, the State Department and the Defense Department (ISA) informed the J-3 Battle Staff that action on the various requirements that were being considered and discussed by the Joint Chiefs and their staff agencies should be halted. But at the same time the Defense Department was given a "firm requirement" to airlift 300 tons of standard American flour from Evreux, France, to Leopoldville for the account of the United Nations. Alerted by the J-3 Battle Staff in mid-afternoon of 14 July and officially directed to proceed later in the evening, USCINCEUR had the first plane loaded and on its way before dawn the next morning. Twenty-three sorties and some eighty hours later, the shipment was completed. In the meantime, at the request of the United Nations, USCINCEUR had dispatched seven planes to Lome and had delivered the hundred tons of hard winter wheat flour to Leopoldville. (26)

These requirements and USCINCEUR's previous efforts were dwarfed, however, by the demands attendant upon the organizing of the United Nations emergency force. The J-3 Battle Staff had an intimation of what was to follow when an "exploratory" request was received on 14 July from the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense (ISA) for the transportation, starting three days later, of from 1000 to 1200 fully equipped Tunisian troops. After ascertaining from J-4 that the movement could get under way as requested, provided the State Department authorized it before the end of the day, the Battle Staff was informed by ISA that the Department of State had approved the move of 593 troops, but that it was to begin as soon as possible since the troops were ready to go. Less than half an hour later the J-3 Battle Staff directed the Operations Division of USCINCEUR to undertake the task with its own airlift resources including, if necessary, the ten aircraft standing by at Furstenfeldbruck, Germany. (27) Shortly afterward the Joint War Room again called USCINCEUR, to warn of a possible move of 500 Ghanain troops from Accra, but the next morning this was changed to a firm requirement to transport 1200 Moroccans from Rabat and an additional 418 Tunisians. Early that morning, on 15 July, twelve hours after USCINCEUR had been directed to start moving the troops, the first aircraft arrived at Tunis. By the following morning, 16 July, the entire first contingent of Tunisian troops had arrived in Leopoldville. (28) By the night of 21 July, at the end of the first week after the United Nations resolved to take action, more than 3000 troops with more than 200 tons of equipment had been transported to

Leopoldville by American aircraft under the control of CINCEUR. (29) Of these, 1,073 men had been lifted from Tunis,

(29) (U) The total UN force in the Congo at this time amounted to about 5,200 men of whom approximately 850 had been transported by the United Kingdom, approximately 500 by the USSR, and Ethiopia had provided the airlift for 617 men of its own contingents. (State Dept Press Release 413, 23 Jul 60, State Dept Bulletin, vol. XLII, No. 1102, 8 Aug 60, p. 223.)

637 had been brought from Ghana and nearly 900 from Morocco. Approximately 560 Swedish troops from the UN Palestine force had been picked up in Cairo, and the UN commander, General Von Horn, with a headquarters party, had been transported from Jerusalem. In addition, 236 of the Ghanaian troops had been airlifted from Leopoldville to Stanleyville. All in all, the troop lift had, in this first week, required sixty-nine sorties, and at least twelve more flights were either in the air or scheduled to take off with the remainder of the Swedish and Moroccan components. Future commitments had already been accepted by the State Department on a scale that promised no lessening of the effort for some time to come. (30)

In addition to the troop movements and flour shipments, CINCEUR had been called on to provide logistical support for the United Nations force. The major items were helmet liners, rations, light aircraft and vehicles. By the end of the first week, 4000 helmet liners, painted UN blue, had been delivered in Leopoldville, and the Joint War Room task force had alerted USCINCEUR to make ready another 7000 for shipment. Ten C-47 aircraft, made available by USAFE, were en route to the United Nations Command, the last of them being delivered on 24 July. Twenty 1/4-ton "jeep" trucks, drawn from Army stocks in the continental United States, were also on their way by the end of the week. These requirements had been filled without much difficulty. Rations presented a greater problem, however. When first informed that the State Department had authorized the shipment of 300,000 "C" rations to the UN Command, both the Joint War Room task force and the J-4 had pointed out that the pork content of American rations would make them unsuitable for Moslem troops, while the Air Force Liaison Officer with the UN Planning Group questioned the availability of transport in view of the large tonnage involved. A series of telephone conversations established the urgency, but also the possibility of spacing the requirement over a 30-day period. Although agreeing that transportation on the basis of 75,000 rations per week could be arranged by withdrawing three planes from the troop lift, USCINCEUR protested that 35,000 man-hours would be needed to remove the pork content. As an alternative USCINCEUR suggested that pork-free rations be obtained direct from production lines in the United States. Further discussion between the J-3 Battle Staff and the Office of the Secretary of Defense (ISA) revealed that, because of the pressing need, the United Nations would accept the rations as they were and would separate them after delivery. The J-3 Battle Staff therefore instructed USCINCEUR on 20 July to proceed accordingly. The first shipment arrived at Leopoldville the next day. (31)

When first called upon to support the UN operations, the European Command's air transport facilities had consisted of three C-130 squadrons with an assigned strength of 51 aircraft, of which 45 were actually on hand, one MATS rotational squadron of 12 C-124's, and three C-119 squadrons. Because of their limited range, the C-119's could not, however, be regularly employed in the Congo operation, but were available only for an occasional special mission. (32) As the scope of the airlift became more recognizable, it had become evident that USCINCEUR's resources would have to be augmented. On 16 July the Joint Chiefs of Staff directed the Air Force to dispatch two MATS squadrons (24 C-124's) to Europe as soon as possible and to place them under the operational control of USCINCEUR. Air lift requests mounted sharply in the next few days and on 19 July USCINCEUR requested an additional reinforcement. The Air Force was unwilling to transfer C-130 aircraft as recommended by USCINCEUR, but indicated that another two squadrons of C-124 aircraft could be sent to Europe without jeopardizing the ability of MATS to react to general war requirements. On the recommendations of J-3, the Joint Chiefs approved this second augmentation, and the additional squadrons arrived at Chateauroux Air Base on 21 July. USCINCEUR, the saturation point of the air route to Leopoldville had almost been reached. Intermittent fuel shortages had already made an appearance at Kano, Accra and other fields, USCINCEUR had reported, while the number of aircraft that could be handled at one time at Leopoldville was limited by inadequate facilities and insufficient support personnel. For this reason, stated USCINCEUR to the Joint Chiefs, further reinforcements would not expedite the movements in the near future, although increased maintenance difficulties might make an additional augmentation necessary. Among the troops being considered by the United Nations for movement during the next two or three weeks, and which had made the reinforcement of USCINCEUR's transport fleet seem necessary, was an Ethiopian contingent. The process of arranging transportation for this unit illustrates rather clearly the procedures by which UN requests were handled and the problems that were sometimes encountered. On 16 July, the Office of the Secretary of Defense (ISA) warned the Joint War Room task force to expect requests covering the movement of a small force from Guinea, a battalion from Mali, a battalion from Ethiopia, and reinforcements for the Tunisian, Moroccan and Ghanaian troops. When advance warning such as this was received either from ISA or from the Air Force Liaison Officer with the UN Planning Group, the Joint War Room task force in turn alerted the appropriate Joint Staff divisions and USCINCEUR, but no actual measures were taken to schedule movements until the State Department, after approving a formal UN request, placed a "firm" requirement on the Defense Department. In this instance, as in others, the formal request, when finally received, differed somewhat from the advance information. As the UN planning progressed, the Battle Staff in the Joint War Room was told on 19 July that the anticipated contingent from Ethiopia would total two battalions. In the meantime, all these probable movements except the Mali and Ethiopian detachments had been established as firm requirements and had been assigned priorities by ISA. However, EUCOM, which set the precise schedules for the various airlifts, informed the Battle Staff on 19 July that General Norstad had taken a personal interest in the Ethiopian movement and that a message recommending it be given a high priority was being forwarded to the Joint Chiefs. It was pointed out in reply that no official request even to consider the movement had yet been made but that USCINCEUR's views would be forwarded to ISA for discussion with the State Department. (35) When a firm requirement for the Ethiopian contingent (1340 men, 100 tons of equipment and 9 vehicles) was established three days later, J-3 Battle Staff was disturbed to find that Stanleyville was to be the destination. Except for the single shuttle lift of a few Ghanaian troops to Stanleyville, all UN troop lifts conducted by USCINCEUR had been to Leopoldville. No general authority existed, the Battle Staff informed the UN Liaison Officer, by which troops could be landed at any other destination. Also there was doubt about the security of the Stanleyville airfield, and it was believed that a large increase in the number of support personnel would be necessary if landings were scheduled for Stanleyville. The next day (22 July), after ISA reported that the field was safe and that the UN would authorize additional support personnel, an operational problem developed. The high elevation of the airfield at Addis Ababa made the use of C-124's impracticable, according to USCINCEUR, but, if C-130's were used, the planes, after discharging at Stanleyville, would be compelled to fly on to Leopoldville to refuel for the return flight to Addis Ababa, since there was no jet fuel at Stanleyville. Nevertheless, this would be feasible, USCINCEUR advised the J-3 Battle Staff. The information from USCINCEUR was in turn presented to ISA which soon afterwards assured the Battle Staff that the movement from Addis Ababa direct to Stanleyville had the full approval of the State Department and OSD. USCINCEUR was immediately instructed to proceed with the operation. No rearrangement of the established priorities was necessary, for by the time the first plane left Addis Ababa on 25 July the other, higher priority, troop lifts were already in progress. (36)

Although a matter of occasional concern, the problem of fuel supply and support personnel at African airfields seems not to have reached major proportions. When the UN operations were just getting underway, USCINCEUR reported on 16 July that support personnel in the Congo itself numbered 87 U.S. Army and 65 Air Force officers and men. After the rush to get started was over, the numbers were reduced, and on 25 July they stood at 73 Army and 58 Air Force personnel. It was at this time, at the beginning of the second week, that the question whether the strength was adequate to service an expanded operation was raised. But as the additional troop movement proceeded, the support strength rose during the following week to 80 Army and 89 Air Force personnel reported on 29 July. Two days later Army personnel had been reduced to 61 while Air Force strength stood at 91. On 4 August, when the UN troop lifts appeared to be tapering off, approximately 39 Army and 78 Air Force support personnel were reported present in the Congo. (37) The fluctuation in reported strengths suggests that temporary additions to the service and maintenance crews could be, and apparently were, quickly dispatched as and wherever the operations demanded. The supply of aviation fuel was likewise more critical at the end of the first few days than it was in subsequent weeks. Fuel stocks at Kano, the most convenient staging and refueling field between Wheelus Field and Leopoldville, were limited by the capacity of the rail connection with the seacoast and by the requirements of commercial airlines, and after three or four days it had become necessary to divert flights to Accra, where, as a result of the sudden increased demands, a similar shortage threatened to develop. The supply at Leopoldville could not be replenished because in the general disruption of affairs the pipeline to Matadi had been shut down and dredging operations, which kept the channel from Matadi to the sea open, had ceased. By 25 July, however, the fuel situation was well in hand. The WASP, on its arrival off the coast, had been ordered to Accra where it discharged some 200,000 gallons of aviation gasoline on 26 July. A Swedish port unit had moved into Matadi. The pipeline was reopened and dredging operations were resumed.

With the arrival, during the week, of U.S. Navy tankers and commercial carriers at Matadi, Lagos and Dakar adequate reserve stocks appeared to be assured. (38)

However promptly and adequately the military Services could respond to an unforeseen demand upon their physical resources without dislocating the normal organization of staff and command responsibility, they could not similarly meet an extraordinary charge against their fiscal and accounting capabilities without resort to an ad hoc arrangement. Under instructions transmitted by word of mouth through customary staff channels, aircraft, men and equipment could be dispatched halfway around the world and be diverted to some special purpose for extended periods of time, but financial accountability and costs on the other hand could not be shifted so easily. The method of handling financial matters that would arise from supporting the United Nations had been discussed informally by the Director of Logistics, Admiral Persons, and his Deputy, on the one hand, and Admiral Grantham of OSD (ISA), and the Air Force Budget Director, on the other, soon after the UN Congo operations got under way. It was agreed then that the Air Force should be designated as the central agency in the Defense Department for such matters. In making this recommendation to the Assistant Secretary of Defense (ISA) on 19 July, the Director of the Joint Staff noted that any such arrangement should not, however, be permitted to interfere with the operational responsibilities of either the Joint Chiefs or the commander of the unified command. (39) The Department of the Air Force was accordingly designated on 4 August as Executive Agent for the Secretary of Defense, with authority to perform all the financial functions of the Department of Defense that were associated with the UN Congo operation. The "operational aspects involving employment of elements of the military forces" were specifically retained as a responsibility of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. (40)

Two questions soon arose: 1) whether the Joint Staff would continue to be informed of individual UN requirements by the Assistant Secretary of Defense (ISA) or whether the Air Force would now be the channel; and 2) whether the Air Force or the Joint Staff would be the action agency for the transfer of parts and equipment to the United Nations force. Although, on the first question, J-3 was somewhat concerned about receiving requests through the Air Force since priorities were set by ISA, it was agreed that the Air Force should receive all requests from the State Department and transmit to the Battle Staff in the Joint War Room all those involving military air or sea lifts. As to the second question, requests for the transfer of equipment or parts from the continental United States were to be taken care of directly by the Air Force, while those involving transfers from EUCOM sources would be passed on to the Battle Staff for action. (41) The relationship between the Joint Staff and the Executive Agent was further defined early in October when the Air Force established specific procedures permitting routine requests for materiel support to go directly from the UN to the Executive Agent Representative in Europe, thence to the appropriate source of supply. The Air Force was also designated as the action agency for operational and special requests, unless the requests involved an overseas activity or source, required special sea or air lift, or affected the combat capability of U S. forces, in which case the Joint Chiefs were to take necessary action. The designation of an Executive Agent meant little change, however, in actual practice. Because USCINCEUR's resources were chiefly involved, the Battle Staff continued to receive and act upon the UN requests for assistance and, although the Air Force replaced ISA as the official intermediary, the requests and information concerning them continued to reach the Battle Staff directly from the State Department. In the meantime, one of the knotty political entanglements had created something of a policy problem. The Congolese Government, in approaching the United Nations for help, had placed its appeal on the basis not of restoring law and order but of repelling an act of aggression by

Belgium troops. (43) Although making no finding of aggression, the United Nations had called upon Belgium to withdraw its troops, but while the UN force was moving in, the Belgian troops had been reinforced also. By 20 July Belgian forces totalled approximately 7,400 men (including one battalion in Ruanda-Urundi), most of whom were in Leopoldville Province. (44) The Soviet representative on the UN Security Council promptly seized upon this opportunity to charge the United Nations with dereliction of duty and to encourage Premier Lumumba to look to the Soviet Union for unilateral support in expelling the Belgians. Negotiations between the Belgian commander and the local representatives of the United Nations had produced an agreement on 19 July that the UN forces would relieve all Belgian troops in the Leopoldville area by Saturday, 23 July, which the Security Council had followed up by bidding the Belgian Government "to implement speedily" the withdrawal called for in the resolution of 14 July. (45) When the

Belgian authorities encountered difficulty in meeting the deadline, Ambassador Timberlake and the USCINCEUR Liaison Officer in the Congo agreed, at the request of UN Representative Dr. Ralph Bunche, to transport the troops in Leopoldville to the Belgian base at Kitona in American aircraft. With this help all the Belgian troops in the city - numbering about 1000 - could be withdrawn in two days, Ambassador Timberlake reported. When informed of the arrangement by CINCEUR headquarters on the morning of 21 July, the Battle Staff in the Joint War Room cited the lack of authorization for intra-Congo airlifts, particularly for transporting Belgian troops, and instructed USCINCEUR to stay the movement. Subsequent telephone messages from USCINCEUR later in the day indicated that the number of troops to be lifted could be reduced to 450, that all the local authorities considered American help highly important, and that the movement would not adversely affect USCINCEUR's other commitments. But when the Battle Staff notified USCINCEUR the following morning that approval had been obtained from the State Department it was learned that the American authorities in Leopoldville, on being instructed not to go ahead with the movement, had worked out a new arrangement by which Sabena Air Lines would divert its planes from the evacuation run to the Belgian troop lift and the American planes would take care of the evacuees. Shortly afterward the State Department rescinded its approval of the troop lift. (46)

The prospect of Soviet intervention raised by Premier Lumumba's threats to call in Soviet troops if the Belgians failed to leave immediately had prompted the Joint Chiefs of Staff to consider the possible courses of action the United States might take in this event. To forestall unilateral intervention by the Sino-Soviet bloc the Joint Chiefs recommended that the United Nations: 1) declare an embargo on shipments of arms to the Congo and a blockade against the further introduction of troops other than of the United Nations; 2) earnestly caution the Soviet Union not to interfere in the Congo; 3) close all airports in the Congo to Soviet military airlifts and be ready to obstruct Soviet use of airfields by blocking the runways; 4) prepare to "physically restrict ship passage into the mouth of the lower Congo." In addition, the United States should, "through the United Nations, and directly" bring pressure to bear on the countries along the air routes to deny overflight privileges and staging facilities to Soviet military airlifts. In the event that military intervention by the Sino-Soviet bloc took place or was actually attempted, the Joint Chiefs recommended that the United States take such action within the United Nations as would lead to an early withdrawal of Belgian forces as well as Sino-Soviet forces, and in addition be prepared to take, unilaterally if necessary, "appropriate military action . . . to prevent or defeat Soviet military intervention in the Congo." The UN troop lift requirements had dropped off considerably at the beginning of August. The only large scale request that came in was for one battalion of Irish troops, which was not scheduled to move until about 18 August. Since the pressure appeared to be easing, the possibility of releasing some of the aircraft was now raised. At this time, approximately 115 aircraft (47 C-130's and 68 C-124's), including the European Command's entire fleet of C-130's, were allocated to the Congo operations. (50)

(50) (UNK) Airlift Readiness Rpt, 7 Aug, in Entry for 8 Aug 60 (1417), JWR Congo Log - August. Of the total planes, 31 were out of commission, in maintenance, on this date. As of 25 July, the total aircraft available for the operation had amounted to 117 planes (45 C-130's, 71 C-124's). (TS) EUCOM, Annual Historical Rpt, 1960, App. C., p. 15.

As a result, according to U.S. Air Forces, Europe (USAFE), Army training exercises had been delayed and a backlog of transport commitments in the theater had piled up. For these reasons, and to conduct periodic inspections, USAFE on 3 August proposed to withdraw all C-130's from the Congo airlift. Not long afterwards, the Air Staff inquired about the return of the four MATS squadrons that had been placed under USCINCEUR's operational control. Plans for inactivating certain MATS units later in the year were handicapped, the Air Staff stated, by the lack of information concerning the return of the planes. But J-3, although looking forward to the time when the United Nations could shift to commercial charters for its transport needs, could not foresee the release of any of the aircraft until the future of the UN operations became clear. (51)

As it happened, the early August lull was succeeded by another flurry of activity. On 12 August the J-3 Battle Staff received a firm requirement for a contingent of Tunisian troops and an Ethiopian battalion to be moved as soon as possible, and the next day the State Department informed the Battle Staff that the United Nations wanted "a lot of troops as rapidly as possible." The movements that might materialize from these requests would extend the range of the airlift considerably. It was probable, the Battle Staff was informed, that approximately 3,400 troops would have to be transported within the next two to four days from five different countries, one of which was Indonesia, to separate destinations in the interior of the Congo as well as to Leopoldville. A few days later transportation was requested for a small detachment of Indian troops from New Delhi, and on 24 August a firm requirement was placed on the Joint Staff for the airlift of 750

Belgian troops from Kamina to Brussels, beginning two days later. (52) For the most part, however, the burden of activity stemming from the mid-month requests fell on the Joint Staff and not on USAFE; what problems they presented turned out to be staff problems rather than operational. As a result of cost figures and other data assembled by J-3 the Indonesian movement, for example, was finally scheduled for sea transport. In the number of troops to be transported the final requirements were somewhat smaller than the original indications, and as the matter of priority was studied the urgency proved less pressing than it had first appeared to be.

By 24 August J-3 was convinced that the emergency was almost over and that a gradual "phase-down" of the airlift could begin. By this time, the total strength of the UN force amounted to approximately 15,700 officers and men, of whom 12,802 had been airlifted by the United States. Although some additional commitments were to be expected, the Joint Chiefs agreed that two of the C-124 squadrons could be returned to MATS control. USCINCEUR was accordingly authorized on 26 August to release them as soon as the European theater could return to its normal readiness posture. The Joint Chiefs informed USCINCEUR that they planned to release the remaining two MATS squadrons as soon as possible, consistent with the Congo situation and USCINCEUR's requirements, particularly as regards to closing out the fueling and staging stops along the route and the operating arrangements in the Congo. But the

Joint Chiefs further stated that they considered any radical change in route and airfield operations inadvisable for the time being. ⁽⁵³⁾ In reply, USCINCEUR estimated that beginning on 1 September two squadrons could be returned to MATS, that a third squadron could be released on 7 September, and the fourth on 21 September. The first two squadrons were released almost on schedule--nine C-124's were returned to MATS control on 2 September and the remainder within a few days--but then USCINCEUR decided to postpone releasing the other two squadrons. In actual fact, the Joint Chiefs by their message of 26 August had intended to authorize the withdrawal of only two squadrons; USCINCEUR on the other hand was interpreting that message as authority to release all four squadrons. USCINCEUR's decision to extend the time schedule, as far as it concerned the last two squadrons, concealed the misunderstanding, although telephone conversations on two occasions on the subject of slowing down the return of the planes should have indicated and corrected the misapprehension. That a lack of agreement existed did not come to light until 20 September, when USCINCEUR informed J-3 that it wished to release one of the two remaining squadrons the following day and the other about ten days later. Only then was it made completely clear to USCINCEUR that these last two squadrons were not to be returned to MATS until the Joint Chiefs determined that the situation permitted it and until they specifically directed USCINCEUR to release them. (54)

On 30 September, at the recommendation of J-3, the Joint Chiefs directed USCINCEUR to release one of the two squadrons and requested USCINCEUR's recommendations on returning the other. By 9 October the squadron that had been released was back in the United States under MATS control. In the meantime, USCINCEUR's recommendation that the Congo air route be closed down and the last squadron be returned to MATS control at the completion of its currently assigned UN mission had been rejected by the Joint Chiefs. A month later, on 8 November, the Joint Chiefs, deciding that half the squadron would suffice USCINCEUR's needs, authorized the release of six aircraft, but before the planes could be returned they withdrew their authorization. In spite of protests by MATS, the squadron was still under USCINCEUR's control at the end of 1960. (55)

The progressive deterioration of affairs in the Congo was the primary consideration in the development of the Joint Chiefs' views on the retention of the MATS planes. In response to the UN resolution of late July, the Belgian forces in the Congo had not departed, but had been gradually redeployed to the base at Kitona, near the mouth of the Congo River, and eastward into Katanga Province, whose separatist movement had met with Belgian sympathy and support. By the end of the first week in August, all the Belgian troops, who now numbered about 8,000 men, had withdrawn to Kitona and into Katanga. The method of conducting the redeployment--for the Belgians withdrew only when relieved by a UN contingent--and the refusal of the UN command to intervene in factional or tribal clashes on behalf of the central government became a source of increasing friction between the UN authorities and Premier Lumumba in particular. A continuation of the process into Katanga and the eventual withdrawal of Belgian forces to Europe hinged partly upon the status of the bases at Kitona and Kamina but chiefly upon the attitude of Premier Tshombe of Katanga, who had threatened to resist by force and arms the entry of UN troops into his province. By 14 August, negotiations with Tshombe had, however, advanced sufficiently to permit the UN forces to begin moving into Katanga. The first Belgian troops had been returned to Belgium a few days before, and by 3 September all Belgian tactical units had been withdrawn. There remained only the support personnel and technicians at the two bases--about 1000 at Kamina and 500 at Kitona--plus a few military advisors retained by Tshombe who was raising a gendarmerie force in Katanga. ⁽⁵⁶⁾ But in relieving the Belgians, the UN force had also replaced them as the object of Congolese resentment. Caught in the power struggle between Kasavubu and Lumumba and between the Central Government and the Katanga regime, the UN troops met with harassment from several directions. By mid-September the Congo again appeared to be heading towards utter anarchy. Then, with the arrest, release and re-arrest of Lumumba and the emergence of Kasavubu's Army chief into a dominant role, chaos gave way to confusion, calm and crisis in rapid succession.

To avoid trouble with the Congolese the State Department had at first been reluctant to authorize airlifts to and from the interior of the Congo, particularly if the lift involved Belgian troops. (57) When the UN Force began relieving the Belgians in the interior, the airlift could no longer be confined to Leopoldville. The next step was to assist in the Belgian withdrawal. On 27 August the inevitable occurred when eight crew members of a MATS plane at Stanleyville were seized and severely beaten by Congolese troops, and probably owed their lives only to the prompt intervention of an Ethiopian UN detachment. Until this time, American aircraft crews had been required by the Ambassador to wear civilian clothes and had been forbidden to bear arms, but thereafter the Defense Department insisted that crew members be provided with side arms. The Stanleyville incident threatened to put an end to American participation in airlifting Belgian troops, which had been scheduled to start the day before. By limiting the loading points to Kamina and Kitona, except for one detachment from Elizabethville, and by prohibiting planes that were carrying Belgian troops from stopping at any other airfields in the Congo outside Katanga, the movement was continued, however, without further unpleasantness. By 3 September, a total of

1,367 Belgian troops had been airlifted to Brussels in American aircraft. Two final contingents, which completed their movement on 14 September, raised the total to 1,696. (58)

With the departure of the Belgian combat units, Mr. Hammarskjold and Dr. Bunche believed that the support personnel could be withdrawn from Kitona and Kamina, and that the UN Command could assume control of the two bases with the assistance of a few Belgian technicians as civilian employees and with the former commanders acting as civilian administrators. Planning for the purely military operations that might become necessary as a result of Soviet intervention, or threat of intervention, had been approved by the National Security Council at the beginning of August, but it had become bogged down in disagreement among the Services over the agency to whom the planning should be assigned. (62)

(62) See pp. 52-54 above for the basic recommendations and NSC approval.

J-5, which had been directed to draft a preliminary study, reported to the Joint Chiefs on 20 August that responsibility for over-all planning should be assigned to the Commander-in-Chief, Atlantic Command (CINCLANT). The choice was reached partly through a process of elimination. The Joint Staff, according to J-5, should not be responsible for preparing command level or detailed theater level plans since it would be inconsistent with the Joint Chiefs' primary responsibility of providing strategic guidance to commanders, would require a more adequate technical staff and library than were available to the Joint Staff, and would compel the Joint Chiefs to review their own plans and coordinate their annexes with those of their subordinates. Having narrowed the choice to CINCNELM, USCINCEUR and CINCLANT, J-5 listed the advantages and disadvantages of each. But it would appear unlikely that J-5 based its recommendations on the "pros and cons," since CINCLANT lacked important advantages listed for both CINCEUR and CINCNELM, namely, an experienced, well-designed contingency planning staff, conveniently located for coordination with associated nations, and lacked also USCINCEUR's advantage of controlling sizeable forces from all Services which were readily available for initial deployment to the Congo. Only one of the four advantages listed for CINCLANT--that it was least likely to be simultaneously involved in other large scale contingency operations--could be considered absolute, and there was subsequent disagreement about its factual accuracy. The disadvantages listed by J-5 similarly provided little basis for rational choice. Probably the deciding factors were the "additional considerations," which to J-5 indicated the desirability of eventually establishing a new unified command with responsibility for Africa South of the Sahara. If this were to be done, J-5 suggested, it would be preferable not to assign contingency planning for the Congo to either USCINCEUR or CINCNELM. (63)

Task Force commanded by a Lieutenant General, U.S. Army, comprising a "modest" permanent planning staff and such forces as might be made available for operations as directed by the Joint Chiefs, and whose planning staff should be located in the Hampton Roads area. At their meeting on 9 December, the Joint Chiefs discussed at considerable length a draft of a message to CINCLANT, which had been prepared in J-5 in implementation of Secretary Gates' decision. Now the question at issue, raised by the Chairman, was whether the Secretary of Defense had intended both operational and planning responsibility to be assigned to CINCLANT. Failing on two subsequent occasions to resolve the issue, the Joint Chiefs decided to defer further consideration of the problem until they could meet with the Secretary of Defense, which they did on 29 December. At that time, Secretary Gates informed them that his intent had been for CINCLANT to have over-all responsibility for both planning and operations until the Joint Chiefs and the Secretary of Defense took "affirmative steps" to relieve CINCLANT of such responsibility. He cited as an example the possibility of the Joint Task Force Commander relieving CINCLANT of the over-all command of operations if the former were established ashore and engaged in a large scale military operation and the further possibility of the Joint Task Force Commander being made a Unified Commander if the operation were of sufficient magnitude. clarification, the last hurdle was cleared, for on 9 December the Joint Chiefs had approved the nomination of Lt. Gen. Paul L. for undertaking contingency planning were at last in order.

By this time the UN forces in the Congo were learning that the way of a peacemaker does not lead to popularity. Gradually thrust into the role of buffer, the United Nations had become the target of denunciation from all parties to the internal strife. As foreign nations sought to turn that strife to their own purposes, the UN forces had also become the only insulation against a civil war of the type waged in Spain during the 1930's, a conflict supported by "volunteers" and equipment from two opposing, foreign ideological camps. A withdrawal of the UN forces from the Congo or indeed any weakening of the UN effort might well have led to a situation of the sort for which the Joint Chiefs desired to have plans in preparation. The continued danger of foreign intervention made it seem necessary to keep USCINCEUR's airlift capabilities in being and the air route to the Congo in operation after the original purpose had been served.

The greatest demands on USCINCEUR's airlift resources and the peak effort in this respect had been concentrated in the first seven weeks following the UN decision to send troops to the Congo. By the beginning of September, the UN force had been built up to a total of 16,013 troops, of whom 13,133, with 3,079 tons of equipment, had been flown into the Congo by the US Air Force. (74) The task had been difficult not because there was any one over-ridingly important problem on the solution of which the success of the operation depended but rather because so much had to be done in a relatively short time without previous preparation. In the four months from 1 September to the end of the year, only 2,814 troops and 889 tons of equipment were airlifted into the Congo. An additional 1,736 troops had been brought in by sea transport during October. By the end of December, the United States had flown 15,947 troops into the Congo from sixteen nations ranging over the globe from Canada to India. (75) It had been, in the words of

INTRODUCTION

The Status of US Policy, January 1961

On 1 January 1961, the US was adhering to a policy toward the Congo and the other newly independent nations of sub-Saharan Africa that was designed to encourage an orderly Western-oriented development of the region in cooperation with the former colonial powers and thus to prevent the dislocation and disruption that would provide opportunities for Communist penetration and exploitation. This basic policy had been adopted by the NSC in April 1960. In terms of military and strategic interest, the US objective was to deny the area to Communist control. The role of the JCS in carrying out this policy consisted in making a periodic survey of the entire area's strategic importance and in assisting the Assistant Secretary of Defense (ISA) in supporting the Department of State in the task of projecting American influence into the region. (1)

(1) (TS) "Sub-Sahara Africa: Policies, March 1957 to mid-summer 1960," draft chapter for JCS history, pp. 20-22.

The statement of US policy had been adopted in April 1960, and was shortly followed by Belgium's granting the Congo independence. Almost at once the Congo was plunged into anarchy, and when Congolese security forces collapsed, Belgium felt compelled to send troops to its former colony to restore order. A series of armed clashes fought during July between Congolese and Belgian troops demonstrated, however, that the independent citizens of the Congo would not cooperate with their former overlords. Instead, the Central Government of the Congo called upon the UN for aid, and requested the US to send 2,000 troops to assist in the task of restoring order.

Rather than embark upon a unilateral military venture, the US, which had first been primarily interested in the evacuation of American nationals, chose to support the UN Emergency Force that was created in answer to the Congolese plea for aid. The most important form of US support was the providing of aircraft to transport UN troops and supplies to the Congo and to evacuate Belgian troops from the area. At the same time, however, planning was begun to meet the contingency of intervention by the Sino-Soviet Bloc. A joint task force was established under CINCLANT to develop and maintain plans for military operations in sub-Saharan Africa. (2)

The Rival Congolese Factions

The months following independence in the Congo saw the erection of a trio of governments. The Central Government of the Republic, headed by President Joseph Kasavubu, had its capital at Leopoldville. It was this, the "legitimate" government that had requested UN assistance, a plea which resulted, among other things, in the dispatch of an emergency force that soon numbered some 19,000 men.

The second government was that of secessionist Katanga Province. Moise Tshombe, leader of this faction, claimed that Katanga should remain independent of the central government; but since this was the richest portion of the Congo, the revenues from its natural resources would be essential to the survival of any Congolese government. Tshombe derived his support from foreign investors, former Belgian colonial officials, and a collection of European soldiers of fortune.

The third government, with its capital at Stanleyville, claimed sovereignty over the entire Congo, including Katanga Province. The Stanleyville government was headed by Antoine Gizenga, who had been indoctrinated in the tenets of Communism and was a disciple of Patrice Lumumba, the rabidly anti-colonial ex-premier of the central government. Lumumba, although removed from office by Kasavubu, and later arrested by the Congolese army, was recognized by the Soviet Union as the legitimate head of the Congo's government. For the most part, the supporters of the Stanleyville regime were the most radical Congo nationalists and the most vigorous foes of colonialism. (3)

Soviet Protests at the UN

Against this backdrop, the UN Security Council met from 12 to 14 January to consider a Soviet complaint of "fresh acts of Belgian aggression against the Congo." The basis of this charge was Belgium's reintroduction of troops into the Congo when it became obvious that Congolese forces could not maintain order. Since some Belgian contingents bound for the Congo used bases in neighboring Ruanda-Urundi, a UN trust territory, the Soviet delegation also claimed "flagrant violations of the international status" of that state. Apparently the Security Council agreed with the Deputy US Representative to the UN, who characterized the Soviet allegation as, "to say the least, a total distortion," for the complaint was rejected. Framing a New Statement of US Policy

On 23 January, just three days after John F. Kennedy was inaugurated as President of the United States, the JCS began work on a memorandum setting forth for the Secretary of Defense their views on conditions in the Congo. A revised memorandum finally was approved and on 30 January forwarded to Robert S. McNamara, President Kennedy's Secretary of Defense. In brief, the JCS expressed increasing concern over the Congo situation, alluded to the danger to other sub-Saharan nations if Communism should gain a foothold in the Congo, and recommended actions designed to stabilize the situation and lead eventually to the establishment of a pro-Western Congolese democracy.

Addressing themselves first to the role of the UN, the JCS recommended that the US continue to press the Secretary General to instruct the UN Congo force to take positive action to restore order. They believed, moreover, that this force should be strengthened as necessary to accomplish this objective and also should be assigned an impartial and efficient leader. The establishment of peace, however, would not solve the Congo problem, so the Secretary General should be urged to guide and assist the troubled nation in the development of a responsible and effective government. In addition, the UN should act to halt the flow of military supplies to the Stanleyville government and to other dissident groups.

Like the JCS, the President and his civilian advisers were disturbed by recent events in the Congo. In his State of the Union message, delivered on 30 January, the President, while pledging continued support to the "heroic efforts of the UN to restore order," warned that "mounting tensions, unsolved problems, and decreasing support from many member states" had combined to jeopardize the success of this UN undertaking. (6) On the same day the Assistant Secretary of Defense (ISA) requested the views of the JCS on a new statement of US policy regarding the Congo. In addition, the Assistant Secretary sought their opinion concerning capabilities for and possible consequences of US military intervention in that chaotic nation.

(6) (U) Department of State Bulletin, vol. XLIV, No. 1129, p. 210.

The policy proposed for JCS consideration was designed to reverse the "drift toward fragmentation in the Congo" and thus prevent the nation from coming under Communist control. It called for strengthening the UN mandate so that the world organization would have exclusive responsibility for maintaining law and order throughout the Congo and for bringing about a "military neutralization" of the area. If necessary, the UN might use force in disarming and controlling the various Congolese armed contingents and in cutting off outside support for the contending factions. Once order had been restored the US, the UN, and other interested nations would cooperate to bring about the creation of a stable coalition government within which all the principal Congolese political elements would have representation. Until the desired coalition attained the necessary stability, however, the UN would have to provide administrative and technical help. An interim UN administration, moreover, would greatly diminish, if not eliminate, the possibility that a rabble-rouser such as Lumumba could seize power. (7)

(7) (S) Appendix to JCS 2262/73, 31 Jan 61; JMF 9111/9105 (30 Jan 61).

On the following day, 31 January, the JCS advised the Secretary of Defense that they agreed both that the UN mandate for action in the Congo should be strengthened and that some sort of UN administration should be established over that nation. [

The Assistant Secretary of Defense (ISA), in stating to the Department of State the Department of Defense views on the Congo policy, repeated the views of the JCS concerning the US capability for intervention. Like the JCS, he expressed agreement with the proposed strengthening of the UN mandate and the suggested establishment of a UN administration for the Congo. (C)

(9) (S) Appendix to JCS 2262/76, 4 Feb 61; JMF 9111/9105

After these views on Congo policy had been transmitted to the Department of State, the Assistant Secretary of Defense (ISA) on 2 February requested the judgment of the JCS on three specific items: 1) the improvements that might be required by the UN Congo force in order to carry out the proposed new mandate; 2) the manner in which the UN should proceed in bringing discipline to a unified Congolese army; and 3) the type of training and manner of employment that should be proposed for Congolese troops. The Assistant Secretary also invited other comments on the implementation of the new Congo policy.

Since it admittedly was possible that the new policy might fail, the Assistant Secretary informed the JCS that an alternative policy was being devised to achieve US objectives in the Congo peaceably. As a last resort, however, the US might be forced to intervene with its armed forces, and for that reason the Assistant Secretary now asked for the views of the Joint Chiefs on: 1) the probable military consequences of such a move; 2) the US capability for effective action; and 3) the present status of contingency planning. ~~TOP SECRET~~

The possibility of military action also was raised at the first meeting of the interdepartmental working group on the Congo on 6 February. The Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs specifically invited the committee members to consider the possibility that the attempt to form a workable coalition might fail and to examine the feasibility of other policies, including military action. (11)

(11) (S) Encl to JCS 2262/78, 13 Feb 61; JMF 9110/9105
(30 Jan 61).

On 17 February, the JCS, in response to the memorandum of 2 February, forwarded to the Secretary of Defense their views on the problems of implementing a strengthened UN mandate for the Congo and their opinions upon various aspects of US military intervention in that nation. In general, the JCS believed that UN forces, in carrying out this new mandate, should exhaust all avenues of peaceful persuasion before resorting to force. If, however, a more vigorous UN effort was to succeed, the organization's military staff would have to be strengthened, the channels of command improved, and the structure of forces reorganized. Because of the time that would be required to reorganize the Congolese armed forces, the JCS were convinced that the UN, initially at least, would have to use its own troops against dissident groups.

Addressing the specific questions posed by the Assistant Secretary of Defense (ISA), the JCS recommended that the UN Congo force be reorganized on a regional basis, that the regional commanders be provided with political advisers, and that the predominantly infantry force be given sufficient reserves, proper medical support, and adequate communications. This force should establish control by persuasion when possible, by "psychological and economic operations," and when absolutely necessary, by force. Any training program for Congolese troops should be conducted by UN personnel and be oriented toward the basic training first of ground forces and later of police and gendarmes. When sufficiently prepared, the Congolese units could assist the UN in establishing law and order. The JCS, accepting the Assistant Secretary's invitation to comment upon other related problems, warned that the US should be prepared to give financial, material, and technical support to the expanded UN operation. For its part, the UN should encourage the use of Belgian technicians in nonpolitical positions.

(12) (TS) JCSM-92-61, 17 Feb 61, with attachment, derived from JCS 2262/77; JMF 9111/9105 (30 Jan 61).

On 21 February, the JCS again informed the Secretary of Defense of their concern regarding the dissident factions within the Congo and recommended that these factions, the Stanleyville regime in particular, be isolated from their sources of armament.

The Death of Lumumba

This recommendation was occasioned by a dramatic, though ephemeral, rise in the popularity of Gizenga's anti-Western nationalism. This outpouring of sentiment favorable to the Stanleyville government stemmed from the murder of Patrice Lumumba.

During January, the Central Government had handed Lumumba over to Moise Tshombe, an implacable foe of the deposed prime minister. The prisoner was led away to Elisabethville where, according to the Katanga government, he was shot while attempting to escape. This pat explanation satisfied no one, and anti-colonial leaders throughout Africa denounced both Kasavubu and the Belgian-supported Tshombe for conspiring to eliminate this most fervid of Congolese nationalists. For the moment, it appeared that Gizenga, as Lumumba's political heir, was the only Congolese leader to whom the nations opposed to colonialism could, in good conscience, give their support.

Katanga's belated announcement, made on 13 February, that Lumumba had been killed occasioned rioting in front of Belgian embassies at Cairo, Moscow, and Belgrade. The USSR, moreover, used Lumumba's assassination as an excuse to demand the dismissal from office of UN Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold, whom the Soviet Union accused of masterminding the Congolese leader's murder. Besides condemning Hammarskjold, Russia also called for: the removal of all Belgian personnel from the Congo; the arrest of Kasavubu's chief of staff, who had been responsible for the transfer of Lumumba into Katangan hands, and of Tshombe; the disarming of the Congolese National Army; the termination of UN operations in the Congo; and full recognition of Gizenga's Stanleyville government as the sole authority over the nation. President Kennedy reacted to this latest crisis by declaring on 15 February that the US would continue to support the UN effort in the Congo and to recognize the Kasavubu regime as that nation's legitimate government. In addition, the President stated that all members of the UN were duty bound to oppose "any attempt by any government to intervene unilaterally in the Congo." (14) The US

(14) (U) Department of State Bulletin, vol. XLIV, No. 1132, pp. 332-333.

Ambassador to the UN, in a speech delivered that same day before the Security Council, emphasized the traditional US opposition to colonialism, endorsed the existing Congolese central government, and called upon the UN to take prompt and effective action to end the crisis. Such action, he continued, would consist of halting all foreign military assistance or intervention, except that conducted within the framework of the UN, and restoring peace and order throughout the Congo. To complement these actions, the various Congolese armed forces should be unified and reorganized as a single non-political body. (15)

(15) (U) Ibid., vol. XLIV, No. 1133, pp. 359-364.

The Security Council Resolution of 21 February

The Security Council had an opportunity during mid-February to weigh the opposing views of the US and Soviet Union concerning the UN activities in the Congo. The occasion of this debate was the council's discussion of a resolution, originally introduced by the UAR, Ceylon, and Liberia, which would authorize the use of force to prevent civil war in the Congo. On 21 February, this resolution was adopted. An alternative resolution, which embodied the Soviet program of liquidating the UN's Congo operation, was rejected.

The resolution of 21 February, which the US had supported, bore a striking resemblance to the proposed Congo policy discussed within the Kennedy administration. In addition to strengthening the UN mandate, the keystone of the new policy, the Security Council called for the removal from the Congo of all foreign military personnel and political advisers who were not under UN control, the reorganization of the Congolese army as a non-political unit, and the convening of the Congolese parliament. This last course of action could lead to the formation of the kind of coalition sought by the US. The proposed elimination of unauthorized foreign advisers was an aspect of the resolution that coincided with the announced policy of both the US and the Soviet Union. (16)

An Easing of Tensions Within the Congo

When the JCS had first begun their review of contingency plans for sub-Saharan Africa, both civil war and armed Communist intervention seemed likely. The Security Council resolution that resulted in the broadening of the UN mandate for Congo operations ended, however, at least for the time, the menace of Russian intervention. Likewise, the danger of full-scale civil war also abated in the months immediately following the Security Council action.

During March 1961, Tshombe met with Kasavubu at Tananarive in the Malagasy Republic. The two leaders agreed to the establishment of a loosely knit Congolese confederation; Katanga would be a partner in this union, and the existing central authority would voluntarily yield most of its powers over the various provinces. Although

Kasavubu at the time appeared willing to accept this arrangement, he later rejected it by endorsing the Security Council's resolution of 21 February, thus indicating his desire to bring the entire Congo under a single government.

In April President Kasavubu again conferred with Tshombe, this time at Coquilhatville in the Congo. When Tshombe, on 26 April, indicated that he was about to break off the talks, Kasavubu had him imprisoned. Although the Katangan leader remained under arrest until 22 June, his confinement apparently did not alter his determination to preserve the independence of his province, for upon being released he vowed to defend Katanga against the central government no matter what the cost.

Although the discussions with Tshombe accomplished nothing, the central government did manage a short time later to reach a rather precarious accommodation with the Stanleyville regime. The scene of this political merger was a session of the Congolese parliament held near Leopoldville, beginning on 27 July. The delegates, among them Gizenga's supporters, created a new Government of National Unity. The nominal head of this coalition was President Kasavubu, but executive power actually was held by Prime Minister Cyrille Adoula, a moderate neutralist. Gizenga was chosen first vice-premier.

Apparently Gizenga was satisfied with this solution, for he promptly dissolved his government. He refused, however, to move from Stanleyville to Leopoldville in order to assume his new duties. He also saw to it that his military forces remained intact and independent of the new government's control. (24)

UN Military Action Against Katanga, September 1961

The greatest single obstacle to a unified Congo remained the dissident Katanga regime. In keeping with its instructions to bring peace and unity to the Congo, the UN command on 13 September directed its forces at Elisabethville to compel Tshombe, using force if necessary, to rid himself of some 500 foreign mercenaries. The Katangans, however, resisted so successfully that the UN contingent appeared for a time to be in grave danger of being isolated and destroyed. The US Government reacted to the situation by expressing, on 16 September, official concern over the fighting in Katanga and by reaffirming its support of the UN operation in the Congo. (25) Two days later the US agreed to a UN request that

In the meantime, Secretary General Hammarskjöld, while en route to a meeting with Tshombe, had perished in a plane crash near Ndola, Northern Rhodesia. He was succeeded by U Thant, who was designated Acting Secretary General on 3 November. Shortly after taking office, U Thant was faced with the necessity of carrying out a new resolution on the Congo, for on the 24th the Security Council authorized the use of whatever force might be necessary to drive the foreign mercenaries from Katanga. Renewed Fighting, December 1961

Tshombe replied to this resolution with a threat to wage total war, using poisoned arrows, if necessary, against the UN forces. This outburst was followed by a succession of attacks against UN personnel stationed in Elisabethville. U Thant reacted to this wave of violence by directing on 3 December that the UN force act vigorously to restore order in the city. On 5 December, since an organized Katangan attack seemed imminent, he ordered the troops to take whatever action was necessary to restore UN rights in Elisabethville. Fighting erupted that same day as the UN force began a campaign that soon brought the city under its complete control. (31)

(31) (U) The US in World Affairs, 1961, p. 263.

In his public statements, as well as in private conversations with US diplomats at the UN, the Acting Secretary General explained that the Congo offensive was designed to weaken the Katangan forces to a point where they could no longer prevent the unification of the entire nation. Force, he said, was not being employed in order to gain political ends; the UN did not wish to impose any particular political order on the Congolese people. In any event the US continued to support UN policies. (32)

A concrete example of American support was the employment of C-130 and C-124 transports to assist in the rapid build-up of UN forces at Elisabethville. (33) Although this intra-Congo airlift was suspended in mid-January when the situation had become more stable; the US made it clear that, in the event of future emergencies, it was willing to resume the operation. (34)

The US also sought to assist the UN diplomatically by attempting to arrange a meeting between Tshombe and Adoula. The Katangan leader agreed, and as a result, U Thant, whose UN forces by this time controlled Elisabethville, proclaimed a temporary truce. At Kitona the two leaders conferred on 20 and 21 December, with Tshombe apparently accepting the authority of the Leopoldville government.

The settlement, however, was dependent upon ratification by the Katanga assembly, and no sooner had Tshombe returned to Elisabethville than he announced that the recent agreement had been forced upon him by the US. The provincial assembly took up this cry, declaring that Katanga need not honor an agreement that had been made under duress. (35)

Guidance for US Policy Toward Africa

In November 1961, shortly before the Security Council voted to have the mercenaries expelled from Katanga, the Acting Assistant Secretary of Defense (ISA) had requested the views of the JCS on a Department of State paper, "Guidance for US Policy toward Africa." The paper, which differed little in content from earlier policy statements, set forth both long-term and short-term objectives for US policy.

The long-term objectives, which were to be gained in from two to ten years, included: identification of the US with the rightful goals of the African states; sufficient economic support from non-Communist nations; an intensification of US influence upon certain "bellwether" countries; and regional, political and economic agreements among the African nations. The principal military goal remained the denial to Communist nations of military bases and strategically significant military influence in any African state. In addition, the US would seek an agreement among the African governments limiting the importation of arms to the amounts needed for self-defense.

The short-term objectives, to be attained within two years, dealt primarily with the training of African leaders, the means of identifying the US with the rightful ambitions of the emerging states, and the continued economic support of the African countries. Again, the main military objective was to deny the area to Communism, but the US also would encourage preliminary steps toward arms limitation agreements among the nations of Africa and would maintain for the time being those US bases presently vital to the national interest.

To attain these objectives, the US would follow certain courses of action, among them the establishment of relations with African leaders. Economic and diplomatic encouragement were also to be provided, and the African states would be warned of the Communist menace and advised of any departures from their professed ideal of neutrality. Although care would have to be exercised to avoid contributing to an arms race which would negate its efforts toward arms limitation, the US would be prepared to give military assistance to these nations.

Because of the arbitrary boundaries of many African states, the US should, however, make no further commitments to assist in the defense of any country's territory. In deference to African sentiment on the subject, the US ought not to oppose attempts to create a nuclear-free zone embracing that continent. (36)

The Deputy Secretary of Defense, in a memorandum for the Secretary of State, expressed his agreement with the JCS recommendation that, for the present, there be no formal review of UN plans. He also recommended that the US mission at the UN urge that the Congo to strengthen and expand his military staff. Another JCS recommendation of which the Deputy Secretary approved was the assignment to the Congo of a senior officer who would serve as military adviser to the US Ambassador and would provide information and recommendations concerning the existing situation and UN military plans (42). The Downfall of Gizenga, January 1962

During January 1962, while the US was taking an increasing interest in military developments within the Congo, the Adoula government, with UN support, continued its efforts to extend its authority over the entire nation. The dissident redoubt at Stanleyville collapsed almost immediately. On 8 January, the national parliament summoned First Vice-Premier Gizenga to Leopoldville to face charges of leading a secessionist movement. The accusations were based on the mutinous conduct of troops loyal to Gizenga and the fact that he had thus far refused to participate actively in the Congolese coalition. Gizenga at first accepted the summons, then vacillated, and finally refused. Fighting then broke out in Stanleyville between national forces and the private army which Gizenga had maintained. UN troops immediately intervened to avert civil war, and after order had been restored Gizenga surrendered. On 20 January, the former leader of the Stanleyville faction was brought to Leopoldville and imprisoned. Recalling perhaps the fate of Lumumba, U Thant informed Prime Minister Adoula that UN troops would be available to protect the prisoner. (48)

(48) (U) Facts on File, vol. XXII, Nos. 1106, 1108.

The Adoula-Tshombe Meetings, March-June 1962

The arrest of Gizenga, however, eliminated only one of Prime Minister Adoula's rivals, for the dissident Katanga government on 4 January 1962 had formally rejected the agreement reached at Kitona in late December. According to Tshombe, Katanga would for the present neither adhere to the Congolese constitution nor expel the foreigners serving in the provincial government and armed forces. Once the central government had proved its good faith, Katanga might reconsider this decision. (49)

(49) Ibid., vol. XXII, No. 106.

Further talks between Adoula and Tshombe, begun during March, came to an end in mid-April. Nothing was accomplished during this session to bring any nearer to realization the dream of a unified Congo. Whereas Tshombe demanded an autonomous Katanga within a federated Congo, Adoula remained equally insistent that the province be integrated into the republic. Neither the rival leaders nor their respective followings seemed at all willing to compromise. (50)

Prospects for a settlement, however, improved unexpectedly on 17 May, the eve of still another meeting between the two men, when Tshombe announced that he would agree to a merger of Katanga with the rest of the Congo. The only condition mentioned at this time by the Katangan leader was the release of some 4,000 prisoners held by the central government.⁽⁵¹⁾ A further sign of progress

(51) Ibid., 18 May 62, 8.

toward unity came on 30 May, when Adoula and Tshombe agreed to the integration, under UN auspices, of Katangan units into the Congolese army.⁽⁵²⁾

(52) Ibid., 31 May 62, 10.

Any expectations that the Congo could quickly be unified were shattered by mid-June. On the 12th Tshombe accused Adoula of refusing to make concessions and of choosing instead to rely upon UN armed might to gain his ends.⁽⁵³⁾ By the end of the month Tshombe had withdrawn from the talks, leaving the situation about as it had been in late January.

(53) Ibid., 13 Jun 62, 5.

US Policy Directives for the Congo,
March and May 1962

While Adoula and Tshombe engaged in this fruitless series of discussions, the Department of State was issuing policy directives for those involved with the Congo problem. On 15 March 1962, the State Department enumerated, as the objectives of US policy regarding the Congo, the "reintegration" of that nation, the reorganization of its armed forces, the continuation of foreign aid and enactment of accompanying measures to bring financial stability and economic recovery to the Congo, and the improvement of diplomatic relations between the US and the Congo. These same objectives were again set forth in a second policy directive issued on 16 May.

In order to achieve a unified Congo, the US at first planned to apply indirect pressure on Tshombe. The US would attempt to convince the Belgian government that it should induce the mining corporations operating in Katanga to pay taxes to the central rather than the provincial government. Later, however, the US decided to increase this initial pressure by urging the UN to advance a unification plan if Tshombe and Adoula should fail to agree. The US would seek Belgian and British advice on any such plan and also the support of these nations in its implementation. Should Tshombe then reject the UN formula, the US would support the central government's effort to assert its rightful authority.

The reorganization of the Congolese armed forces would begin with the sending to the Congo of a small US advisory team that would prepare recommendations for submission to the central government. US, UN, and Congolese officials would then work out a program based upon these recommendations. The actual reorganization and training of the armed forces would be conducted under UN auspices, but foreign advisers might be employed in carrying out the program. To ease the economic dislocation that would be caused by the reorganization, various nations were to establish a fund which the UN would use to create employment for ex-soldiers.

Although the US was willing to continue assistance to the Congo and desired that Belgium also undertake technical and financial programs, all foreign aid would be channeled through or coordinated by the UN. In addition, the UN was to play a dominant role in bringing financial stability and economic progress to the Congo. Among the projects to be undertaken by the UN and various specialized international agencies were public works, the distribution of food to the unemployed, budget reform, improvements in administration, and improvements in the transportation system.

Finally, the US sought the establishment at Washington of a Congolese Embassy, a move which would strengthen diplomatic ties between the two countries and also give the Congo a voice in any intra-African discussions held among the ambassadors at the US capital. (54)

Summary

In brief, US policy toward the Congo remained unchanged during this period, for the US from January 1961 through May 1962 gave unhesitating support to the UN efforts to bring order to the Congo. Although the phrases used to describe the American goals varied somewhat, the US worked steadfastly for the unification of the Congo, the establishment of a workable coalition, and the continued presence in the Congo of some form of UN authority until the new government had attained sufficient stability to maintain order throughout the nation. Throughout these 18 months, the principal military objective was the denial to the Communist bloc of a bridgehead in the Congo.

By the end of May 1962, some progress had been made toward the realization of these aims through support of the UN's Congo operation. The Stanleyville regime, which had been supported by the Soviet Union, was dissolved, and its leaders were either dead or under arrest. Moreover, the danger of armed Communist intervention appeared to have passed. In spite of these successes, Katanga Province continued to defy the central government, and until this dissidence had been at least moderated, neither Congolese unity nor the establishment of a stable coalition could be achieved.

CHRONOLOGY
June 1962 - December 1962

26 Jun 62

Katanga's President Moise Tshombe left Leopoldville, breaking off his negotiations with Congolese Premier Cyril Adoula. This departure resulted in the collapse of the latest in a series of UN-sponsored negotiations aimed at reuniting Katanga with the central Congo government.

Prior to his departure, Tshombe and Adoula had made considerable progress toward accommodating their differences concerning the four major problem areas of the projected Congo federation: economics and finance; transport and communication; monetary policy; and military organization. They had agreed to the establishment of four commissions, each composed of representatives of the Congo, Katanga, and the UN, to work out the details of the preliminary agreements that had been reached in each of the above four areas.

The success promised by the Tshombe-Adoula agreements was never realized because of Tshombe's departure; the failure of their talks appears, on the other hand, to have set the stage for the implementation of a series of US-backed UN actions designed to accomplish what the negotiators had not.

26 Jun 62

Assistant Secretary of Defense (ISA) Paul H. Nitze transmitted to Assistant Secretary of State Harlan Cleveland the Defense Department suggestions for improving the air arm of UN forces in the Congo (UNOC).

The entire UNOC air force consisted at this time of 4 Ethiopian F-86s, 5 Swedish J-29s, and 6 Indian Canberra, flown and maintained as "national contingents." Nearly two-thirds of this slender force was, moreover, grounded or of marginal use, and the UN apparently envisaged considerable delay in reconstituting it. Although this situation disquieted the US, and although the UN had itself put out feelers to the US on the availability of T-33s for the formation of a standardized air force, the US felt that the UN should work to improve the existing arrangement of national contingents.

To this end ASD (ISA) drawing upon recommendations submitted on 5 June by the Joint Staff, submitted a list of several actions by which UNOC could improve the efficiency of the air arm. Several logistical actions were recommended, as was a clarification of the mission requirements of the air arm. Additionally, UNOC should, for the longer term, ask Sweden to provide the entire tactical air arm.

In the short run, there were certain operational actions that would help convince Katanga of UN air superiority and determination to act, if necessary:

1. An increased reconnaissance program over Katanga.
2. Periodic shows of force over Katanga.
3. Increase in the number of aircraft available to the UN, by at least two J-29s.
4. Development of UNOC plans for rapid introduction into the Congo of bombs and other munitions that might be necessary in the event of hostilities.
5. Equipping the Ethiopian F-86s with rockets.

28 Jun 62
(No. 4)

Acting with and upon the advice of the JCS, ASD (ISA) informed the Department of State that, from a military viewpoint and subject to certain modifications, the State Department's proposed "Guideline for Policy and Operations" for the Congo provided "an adequate basis of foreign policy and operational guidance."

81(a)5

According to the "Guidelines" US policy continued to be based upon the assumption that support of the UN in the Congo was the best course under present circumstances. The US had to be aware, however, that Congo nationalism was on the rise, that the Congolese would become more and more sensitive to UN infringement of their sovereignty, and increasingly impatient with the slow progress of UN programs. Nonetheless, a stable unified Congo, non-aligned but pro-Western, could still eventuate; and the US could best help bring this about by supporting moderate nationalists in the key positions of power, and by working for as much centralization of power as feasible.

In pursuit of this basic end, the US had several specific long and short-range objectives in the Congo, such as: 1) minimizing Soviet Bloc influence and activity; 2) supporting a "successful nation-building effort" under UN auspices; 3) rehabilitating the Congo economy; 4) encouraging the establishment of a full and close relationship between the Congo and Belgium; 5) peaceful reintegration of all secessionist groups under a new constitution; and 6) the establishment of the security conditions necessary for economic growth and governmental stability, by a redefinition of the role, and reorganization, of the Army, Gendarmerie, and police forces.

In pursuit of these various objectives, several lines of US action were suggested, including:

1. Continued political and material support of the moderate Central Government, so that it might demonstrate economic progress and consolidate its political position.

2. Assisting the UN in keeping such troops in the Congo as were necessary to assure law and order and bring about reunification.

3. Imposition of a systematic program of pressures on both Tshombe and Adoula to bring about peaceful re-integration of Katanga and participation of the Conakat party in a coalition government.

4. Helping Adoula broaden his personal political base, while at the same time developing relations with the more extreme elements, in order to moderate their attitudes.

5. Aiding the reorganization and training of the Congolese armed forces, under UN auspices.

6. Support of a long-term nation-building program by urging UN and Belgian participation, resolution of outstanding Congo-Belgian issues, reintroduction of private investment, and Congo membership in and/or cooperation with various international economic organizations

7. Impressing UN leaders with the need for flexibility in their operations, and the necessity of adjusting themselves to the rise of Congolese nationalism and a growing rapport between the Congo and Belgium.

8. Encouraging the Congolese government to join moderate African councils.

9. Continuation of close consultation with Belgium and the UK, recognizing at the same time that although their special interests have worked against formulation of common policies, agreement was possible on the objective of unity.

Any of the above objectives and lines of action might be modified or eliminated, the "Guidelines" concluded, if: 1) the Adoula government fell; 2) the GOC drifted rapidly to the left; or 3) the UN withdrew before Katanga was reintegrated and some measure of stability and security restored.

The only changes on the "Guidelines" suggested by the JCS and DOD were two additions to the "long-range objectives" of the US in the Congo: denial of military bases and influence to the Soviet Bloc; and a "cooperative" Congolese attitude regarding such US security needs as rights of overflight and airfield and port facilities.

29 Jun 62
(No. 5)

At a meeting of the UN Congo Advisory Committee (CAC), U Thant announced that it was too early to draw any conclusions from the apparent breakdown of negotiations between Adoula and Tshombe (see item 26 June 1962) and that he intended to continue to press for the resumption of talks. Adopting a pessimistic tone, the Secretary General went on to say that, in view of the possibility that Tshombe would resume his secessionist activities, it might become necessary in the next few weeks to invite the Security Council to review the entire Congo situation, in order to clarify and strengthen existing mandates or provide new ones.

U Thant also expressed his concern over the Katangan Independence celebration scheduled to be held in Elisabethville on 11 July, and noted that the UN was trying to dissuade Tshombe from holding the celebration. (See item 12-17 July 1962.)

(No. 6)

In a conversation with Ambassador Gullion, Congo Premier Adoula outlined his reaction to the breakdown of his negotiations with Tshombe. Adoula was at a loss as to what steps he might now take. He was adamant, however, in refusing to renew negotiations with Tshombe until he had some assurance that Tshombe would not continue his stalling tactics. For the same reason Adoula also refused to participate in the work of the Commission established by him and Tshombe, until their purposes had been adequately defined.

(No. 7)

The US Mission to the UN (USUN), in an assessment of the Katanga problem, reported general agreement at the UN that the current situation could not be allowed to drift much longer because "time was working for Tshombe." The UN delegation believed that delay favored Tshombe because: 1) the UN financial crisis would not permit maintaining substantial military forces in the Congo after the beginning of 1963; 2) Adoula's political position was deteriorating rapidly and would probably not remain tenable unless Katanga was reintegrated shortly; 3) the GOC's economic problems were mounting because it was devoting too much of its energies to the Katanga problem.

On 12 July, the UN retaliated for the participation of some two thousand soldiers in a Katangese Independence celebration on 11 July by establishing a road block at what had been the only remaining major uncontrolled route to the Katangese capital. The UN justified the roadblock on the grounds that, inasmuch as Tshombe had agreed to limit the troops participating in the celebration to a token force, the size of the demonstration had been a breach of faith.

In reporting the incident to the State Department, the US Consul in Elisabethville noted that, although some form of counteraction to the Katangese insult was justified, the establishment of the roadblock put the UN out on a limb, and created a potentially dangerous situation.

Five days later an estimated 10,000 women (members of the Association of Katangese Women), armed with sticks and stones, attacked the UN roadblock. The attack, which UN troops repulsed by using clubs and by firing into the air, resulted in a number of casualties on both sides.

Reportedly, United Nations spokesmen indicated that they believed the attack had been staged by the Katangese government for political purposes. This view was supported by the US in a public statement released by the State Department.

At a press conference in Helsinki, U Thant said that he would ask the UN Security Council for a new mandate on the Congo, or at least a renewal of the old mandate. Thant said that the failure of negotiations between the Central Congolese Government and Katanga was attributable to Tshombe and his two colleagues, Munongo and Kimbe, whom he characterized as "a bunch of clowns."

The US Special Military Advisory Team, Republic of the Congo (headed by Col, M.J.L. Greene, OASD (ISA), and hence called the Greene Team) submitted its report to the Assistant Secretary of Defense (ISA). The report thoroughly examined the background and present status of the Congolese Armed Forces, presented conclusions, and recommended several courses for the reconstitution, supply, and training of Congolese forces.

Having concluded, among other things, that the Congolese would require foreign training, advice, and material assistance to establish an effective armed force that could provide internal security, the Greene Team recommended that:

1. The US take the initiative in proposing a broad program, under a UN "umbrella," for the modernization and training of the Congolese Armed Forces. In addition, the US should organize, also under UN auspices, a small international military staff to monitor the program.

2. The Congolese be urged to reorganize their armed forces into a single, unified military structure, embracing an Army reduced from the present 25-30,000 to 14,000, a small air force for transport and liaison missions, and a small naval force of river patrol craft.

3. Major General Mobutu be invited to the US for an orientation tour. Other Congolese officers should be given school and orientation tours.

4. Any material aid furnished to the Congolese should be phased in accordance with demonstrated Congolese progress.

5. The governments of Belgium, Canada, and Norway or Sweden be urged to establish or expand various training and advisory programs.

6. An English language training program be established as soon as possible for Congolese military personnel.

7. The Congolese air force should have six US advisers and ample US material support; the air force should also be urged to contract with a civil airline company for operation and maintenance of its aircraft.

8. The Congolese Army should be given an immediate token grant of vehicles, radio sets, repair parts, and "C" rations.

9. The US should maintain on duty in the Congo a small US military team, attached to the embassy but not part of the military attache system, with the following missions:

- a. Maintaining liaison with Congolese military authorities,
- b. Monitoring the training of the Congolese armed forces,
- c. Monitoring the use of any US military equipment supplied to the Congo, and
- d. Recommending changes in the amounts and types of military assistance.

U Thant told the CAC that recent evidence of Tshombe's bad faith and hostile attitude and the approaching UN financial crisis combined to suggest the necessity for a change in the UN's Congo policy. U Thant thought that the situation called for a more positive approach to Congo problems, including the use of all means short of force. U Thant specifically proposed the adoption of a series of measures (largely economic) to end the Katanga secession. He warned that these measures might lead to resumption of hostilities, and indicated his belief that he was not empowered under the existing mandate to use force. He therefore asked the CAC, particularly those members who had troops in the Congo, whether they thought he might undertake this new course of action under the existing directives, or whether it would be necessary for him to approach the Security Council for a new mandate.

The CAC representatives agreed that the existing mandate was sufficient to cover the expanded program of action contemplated by U Thant, but expressed the hope that the use of force would not be necessary. They agreed to consult their governments and report their official positions to U Thant at a subsequent meeting scheduled for 31 July (see item).

During discussions with US representatives following the meeting, U Thant made it clear that he now thought he had authority under existing resolutions to undertake all measures short of force, and had abandoned the idea of seeking a new Congo mandate from the UN.

Congolese Premier Adoula formally proposed a new constitution for the Congo, and called on the UN to provide expert assistance in drawing up the final document. Adoula hoped that the constitution would be ready for presentation to the Congolese Parliament in September. He noted that the proposal had grown out of the work of the committees established during the recent Adoula-Tshombe talks (see item 26 Jun 62). The State Department quickly endorsed Adoula's statement saying that his initiative would make possible immediate concrete steps to achieve integration.

The following day Tshombe announced that the proposed constitution, incorporating significant concessions to the Katangese demand for self-rule, was "what we have always wanted."

The delegates to the CAC reconvened and gave their governments' general approval to U Thant's continuation of his proposed course of action without recourse to a new mandate (see item 24 Jul 62). They were, however, still apprehensive concerning the possibility that Thant's proposed expansion of the existing mandate to encompass all measures short of force might in fact lead to a new outbreak of hostilities. The members of the Committee apparently felt, nonetheless, that this risk was preferable to calling a Security Council meeting that would be undesirable and probably fruitless.

U Thant appealed to the members of the United Nations for their continued assistance in his efforts to reunify the Congo. U Thant characterized the current situation in the Congo as particularly crucial in view of the lives, effort, and money already expended, and the financial crisis which the UN faced because of the unprecedented drain on its resources caused by the Congo operation. It was U Thant's desire to effect a peaceful solution to the problem; but, he observed, peaceful endeavors had so far not produced fruitful results. U Thant called on the member governments to use their influence to persuade the principal parties in the Congo to settle their differences peacefully. He noted that if such persuasion should finally prove ineffective, he would ask them to consider what further measures might be taken. As a specific measure he mentioned the application of economic pressures upon the Katangese authorities, which might, as a last resort, culminate in the prohibition of all trade and financial relations between Katanga and the member states.

(No. 16)

At the request of ASD (ISA), the JCS reviewed the report of the Greene Team (see item 23 Jul 62) for the Secretary of Defense. The JCS found the Greene Team recommendations to be generally sound and consistent with US objectives in the Congo, and they concurred in each of them. Regarding the recommended immediate shipment to the Congo of vehicles, radio equipment and rations, the JCS noted that this measure would not make any major contribution to the military effectiveness of the Congolese armed forces, who were in greater need of reorganization, training, and discipline. This shipment would, however, serve as a political earnest of US intention to support a nation-building effort in the Congo. (See item 15 Aug 1962)

Prior to furnishing any equipment or deploying the US military liaison team proposed by the report, the JCS continued, the US should secure GOC agreement to the general concept of the Greene Team Report, and the GOC should afford the US military team access to the facilities and information necessary for performance of its duties. A conventional military assistance program should then be implemented "in an orderly manner . . . consistent with the long term needs of the Congolese armed forces." The US should be aware, the JCS warned, that any aid program might encourage a GOC attack upon Katanga.

UN support should be obtained prior to a US attempt to implement a military assistance program for the Congo. After this, however, the program should be developed and administered bilaterally between the US and the Congo. (See item 23 Aug 62).

With the above recommendations, the JCS also forwarded to the Secretary of Defense information on the cost and availability of equipment for immediate shipment, and proposed Terms of Reference and a Joint Table of Distribution (JTD) for the US military liaison team in the Congo (See item 20 Dec 62).

Sporadic fighting broke out between Katangese and Congolese troops in the vicinity of Albertville. UNOC attributed the action to attempts by the Katangese to take Albertville and viewed it as a direct challenge to UN authority. Consequently, with the approval of UN headquarters, UNOC told Katangese officials to cease all military movement. Katanga claimed that its gendarmerie had acted in self defense, but ordered a cease fire nonetheless.

(During the crisis UNOC had explicit authorization to halt Katangese military operations, by all means at its disposal.)

ASD (ISA) recommended to the Department of State that, as recommended in the Greene Team Report (see item 23 Jul 62), a token shipment of military equipment be made to the Congolese Armed Forces. Although all of the equipment recommended by the Greene Team was not immediately available, ISA said, that portion that was on hand should be shipped as soon as possible, for political impact. (The full "token shipment" recommended by the Greene Team would have cost over $2,000,000; the value of the equipment immediately available was $100,000.)

Adopting in part the JCS position regarding the token shipment (see item 8 Aug 62), ISA stated that the impact of the shipment would be more political than military. According to ISA, the primary purpose of the shipment would be "to create a climate of trust in which the Congolese would be more amenable to acceptance of the long range concept for force modernization." However, where the JCS had recommended that the GOC should agree to the concept of the Greene Report before any shipments were made to the Congo, ISA recommended that the concept of the Greene Team Report should be presented to the GOC at UNOC military officials in the Congo revealed to Ambassador Gullion the outlines of their planned actions in the event the UN was drawn into hostilities in Katanga (see item 14-17 Aug 62). The objectives of the UN would be capture of Elisabethville, Jadotville, and Kaminaville--rather than all points in Katanga, which UNOC did not feel it was strong enough to control. To secure these objectives, the UN would, in sequence: concentrate its forces; clear the Elisabethville area; and send forces to Jadotville and Kaminaville. Having secured these three points, the UNOC would then conduct "mopping-up" actions at Katanga (town), Mitwaba, Kapona, and Baudouinville. Action against Kolwezi, where many of the white mercenaries were centered, would be "assessed" by UNOC after the capture of Jadotville, when it would be decided whether to continue on to Kaminaville or to advance on Kolwezi.

In presenting the plan to Ambassador Gullick, UNOC officials emphasized repeatedly that US airlift would be absolutely essential to the successful concentration of forces and equipment, and that additional fighter-bombers and reconnaissance aircraft would also be required. 19 Aug 62
(No. 24)

Upon learning that UNOC had a contingency plan for seizing control of key locales in Katanga (see item 18 Aug 62), the Secretary of State emphasized strongly to Ambassador Gullion that the resumption of military action between Katanga and UNOC would have "disastrous consequences" both for the UN and for US policy. The Secretary stated that the US purpose in supporting the UN in the Congo was to bring about a stable and peaceful Congo free from the chaos that would create Communist opportunities. To this end, the US was seeking reintegration of Katanga by peaceful means. The Secretary recognized that conflict between UNOC and the Katangese was possible and that UNOC contingency planning for self-defense was therefore justified. The Secretary thought that contingency planning for the protection of the civilian population was also justified. The US should be very careful not to give the UNOC any encouragement in planning for any larger or more aggressive actions.

It was not the purpose of the UN, the Secretary continued, to integrate Katanga into the Congo by force, or to destroy Tshombe. If the present attempt to bring about integration by economic persuasion did not succeed, then the US would need to re-examine its policies with a view to developing "new tactical possibilities" for securing peace in the Congo. (See item 28 Aug 62.)

(No. 25)

UN Secretary General U Thant distributed a Plan for National Reconciliation in the Congo to the members of the UN Security Council. The plan was the result of a month of negotiations between the US, Great Britain, Belgium, and the UN, which had followed the breakdown of talks between Adoula and Tshombe on 26 June (see item), and was a modified version of a proposal developed by the US on the basis of these talks (see item 9 Aug 62).

U Thant's plan (see Appendix I for text) had two parts: proposals for reunification, and "courses of action" the UN would follow to secure the adoption of the proposals. The proposals included the following:

1. The Central Government, assisted by UN experts, would prepare a draft constitution taking into account the views of the state (provincial) governments and interested political groups in the Congo. The draft was to be completed by September.

2. Again assisted by UN experts, the Central Government would prepare a draft financial law setting forth arrangements for the division of revenues, and regulations and procedures for the utilization of foreign exchange. The views of all state governments and interested political groups would be invited and taken into account. The financial arrangements would to the maximum degree possible assure retention by the individual state of revenues generated within its area. The Central Government and the state governments would have separate sources of taxation, but would, until such definite arrangements had been established, share equally the revenues from taxes and duties. An international agency would control the utilization of foreign exchange, taking into account the individual needs of each state, but making available for the essential needs of Katanga 50 per cent of the foreign exchange generated within that state.

3. An international council would work out a plan for currency unification.

4. Armed forces commanders who had not already done so would take an oath of allegiance to the President of the Republic. A military commission composed of one representative of the Katanga Government and one representative of the Central Government, assisted by UN experts, was to develop within 30 days a plan for the rapid integration of all military units into the national armed force. This plan would, in turn, be implemented within 60 days. The military commission would, during all this time, enjoy complete freedom of movement throughout the territory of the Congo, to inspect progress and compliance.

5. The conduct of foreign affairs would be reserved to the Central Government.

6. The Central Government would declare a general amnesty immediately.

7. All central, state, and local authorities were to cooperate fully with UNOC.

8. The Central Government would be reconstituted to provide equitable representation for all political and provincial groups; in addition, some ministerial posts would be assigned to members of Tshombe's party.

In pursuance of the plan the Secretary General planned to undertake the following "courses of action":

1. Phase I - Both the proposals and courses of action would be presented to Adoula; upon his acceptance, the proposals would then be presented to Tshombe. The proposals were to be explained to the Katangese authorities, who would be expected to reply within ten days. At the same time, Adoula would be urged "to enact or decree legislation" (if it did not already exist) regulating imports and exports to and from the Congo. Interested governments would, for their part, make public statements of their determination to see the end of Katangese secession, and would take other steps in concert with the UN showing their support for the Central Government. The US, for instance, would consider giving the GOC a small "impact" shipment of military equipment (in demonstration of support) and additional aid upon completion of agreements on the utilization of foreign exchange; the UN would assist the GOC in modernization of the army; and Belgium would help with the collection of duties on Belgian exports to the Congo. Also during this phase representatives of the Union Minière Haut-Katanga were to be invited by the Government of the Congo to discuss matters of mutual interest, including the Government's attitude regarding the future activities of the company.

2. Phase II - During the ten days following the presentation of the UN plan, all governments would urge the Katangese to accept the UN plan. If the Katangese failed to indicate immediate acceptance, they would be presented with a ten-day time limit, after which the members of the UN would, if requested by the Central Government, comply with the Central Government's regulations regarding exports of copper and cobalt from Katanga. If the secession continued, more stringent measures were to be taken, including the withdrawal of Belgian technicians, suspension of communications services, the cessation of air traffic, and a blockade of imports and exports.

3. Phase III - If Phase II failed, the Congolese Government would request all interested governments to refuse importation of copper and cobalt from Katanga, unless the shipments were authorized by the Central Government.

4. Phase IV - Upon the failure of Phase III, discussions between the interested governments and the UN would take place regarding other measures which might be taken.

In presenting his plan to the Security Council, U Thant stated that the Katangese authorities must respond affirmatively to his proposals "within a quite brief period." He also informed the Council that Robert Gardiner, Chief of the UN operation in the Congo, had already been instructed to begin implementing the plan.

ASD (ISA) forwarded to the Department of State the DOD comments on the Greene Team Report. Using, in many cases, the language of the JCS comments (see item 8 Aug 62) ISA endorsed the Team Report. Also, like the JCS, ISA recommended that any military assistance program to the Congo be administered bilaterally, after UN support had been obtained. But, in consonance with views expressed earlier to the Department of State (see item 15 Aug 62), ISA felt that the token shipment of military equipment should be made before the GOC approved the concept of the Greene Team Report; the JCS had felt that no shipments should be made before this approval was obtained. ISA did recommend, however, that shipments other than the token shipment should not be sent to the Congo until the GOC had agreed to the concept of the report, and had requested UN assistance for the broad training program envisioned by the report. Neither should the US military liaison mission recommended by the Team report be sent until the GOC had done this, and until the US and UN had agreed upon an assistance program and the nature of US support thereof. In the meantime, ISA recommended that one US Army officer should be assigned liaison duties in the Congo.

ISA emphasized that the UN had procrastinated for over two years in the matter of training the ANC. Positive US action, to prod the UN and the GOC, would be necessary to get any effective training program underway.

Robert Gardiner presented U Thant's Plan for National Reconciliation (see item 19 Aug 62) to Katangese officials (Tshombe being absent). Gardiner did not present the "courses of action" of the U Thant Plan; however, in response to questioning by the Katangese, he stated that, although the UN did not intend to impose the plan, the plan was not open to negotiation, and that there was a ten-day time limit on Katangese acceptance.

The following day, in a message to the Secretary of State, US Ambassador Gullion opined that Tshombe had deliberately absented himself from Elisabethville at the time of Gardiner's presentation and that this indicated a "first installment in a new round of delaying tactics." Gullion added that he thought Tshombe would never seriously consider integration unless it was made clear to him that he could not resort to the delay and evasion which had frustrated past efforts at a settlement. (No. 29)

In a message to Ambassador Gullion, the Secretary of State emphasized that achievement of a peaceful settlement was paramount among all questions of Congo policy. Such considerations as the ten-day time limit on Tshombe's acceptance of the U Thant plan were clearly subordinate to this end. The proposal offered Tshombe was not, Secretary Rusk said, a mere formality which must be performed before the inevitable application of enforcement measures. On the contrary Rusk believed that foreclosure of a peaceful negotiated settlement would raise "very grave and far-reaching questions" for US policy. In the Secretary's view the alternative routes to settlement were far from clear. A military solution was certainly "unpromising," and solution by economic sanctions was unlikely, given the reluctance of several "key" governments to cooperate in such a program.

(S-EYES ONLY) Msg, SecState to Leopoldville, 351, 27 Aug 62.

28 Aug 62
(No. 30)

Ambassador Gullion assured the Secretary of State that he understood fully that US policy in the Congo looked to integration of Katanga by peaceful means. But, in a long discourse responding to the Secretary's 19 August exposition of US policy (see item), the Ambassador explored the implications of that policy and the possibility that force might eventually be necessary to achieve its objectives.

The Ambassador emphasized at the start that the ENOC contingency plan was "just that and nothing more - a plan drawn up by military men against the contingency that they may be attacked"; the plan might not have the approval of UN Headquarters or have any official status, but it was the sort of plan whose absence US officials had long deplored and whose completion they had long urged.

The Ambassador also emphasized that, to the extent a choice was available, the UNOC would surely limit its use of force to "quelling incidents or protecting the civilian population," as the Secretary had suggested. UNOC was convinced, however, (as were the Ambassador and the entire Country Team) that it could not submit passively to a significant attack; self-preservation would require that it engage the main body of attackers. With regard to choice of objectives, force requirements, and elements of strategy there could be differences of opinion (as indeed there were among the members of the Country Team) but there was unanimity "in Leopoldville" that the UNOC force could not "sit down in Elisabethville" while its perimeters and lines of communication were attacked and destroyed.

In assessing UN military intentions in the Congo, the Ambassador continued, the US should realize that the UN considered itself in an entirely different relation to the Central Government than to Katanga or any other province. If negotiations failed and the GOC tried to subdue the Katangan rebels, UNOC would not interpose itself to protect the latter. It would, on the other hand, intervene to protect the GOC, as it had demonstrated during the Albertville incident (see item 14-17 Aug 62)

Under the U Thant Plan (see item 20 Aug 62), UNOC would be less likely to confront situations that might involve hostilities, the Ambassador thought, inasmuch as the plan sought to provide a reasonable, peaceful solution, using economic sanctions for leverage. Nevertheless, hostilities might occur, and the U Thant Plan should not be put forth with US support if the US was not prepared to accept its full implications. If hostilities occurred in the implementation of the U Thant Plan, and the US then withheld its full support from the UN (as, for instance, by refusing to provide necessary airlift), the results for US policy would be "grievous." The UN would have to use force decisively, the Ambassador said; otherwise the very conditions the Secretary feared--chaos and Communist opportunity--would likely result.

The Ambassador saw only two alternatives to the U Thant Plan. The ANC could resort to force, seeking help from any quarter to end the secession and thus giving the Communists an obvious opportunity. In a less likely case, the UN could turn over responsibility to the ANC in an orderly manner, after that organization had been made equal to such responsibility. Then, the GOC could try to consolidate its own territory in a long and risky civil war. This course would relieve the strains being put on US alliances by the UN Congo operation, but it would cause incalculable harm to the UN and to the lives and property of allied nationals in Katanga--far greater harm than anything to which the implementation of the U Thant Plan would expose them.

The UK, Belgian, and US consuls at Elisabethville presented Tshombe with a joint statement of their governments' views on the UN Plan for National Reconciliation (see items 20 and 24 August 1962). The consuls emphasized that their governments, as well as those of West Germany and Italy, were united in support of the plan. They indicated, in addition, that Katangese acceptance of the plan would permit their governments to help in the development of the economy of the whole Congo. They further stated that "prompt" acceptance would be an "act of political wisdom," whereas a Katangan refusal to accept the plan would produce a situation where a later solution as favorable to the interests of Katanga would be difficult to obtain.

Tshombe replied that his government was giving the plan serious study and would reply when the study was completed (see item 2 Sep 62).

The Government of Katanga announced that Congolese troops had landed at Kamina air base in North Katanga and that it was protesting the action to the UNOC.

The following day Gardiner, replying for the UN, expressed his surprise at the Katangese protest, pointing out that the Congolese landed at Kamina had been placed under UN authority as a result of long-standing plans of which Tshombe had been aware. He indicated that since the troops were under the absolute control of the UN force commander and consequently obliged to observe all the agreements and principles of the UN, there was no reason to consider their deployment to Kamina as an act of the Central Congolese Government. Mr. Gardiner therefore categorically rejected the Katangese protest.

3 Sep 62
(No. 33)

Tshombe's reply to the proposals of the U Thant plan (see items 19 and 24 Aug 62) were received by the UN. Although he deplored what seemed to him an ultimatum in the plan, the Katangese leader termed U Thant's proposals a basis for the establishment of a "viable" Congo, and promised to reply within the given time limit. He greeted "with enthusiasm" the plan's call for a federal constitution, and stated that the long delays in reaching such a federal solution could not be ascribed to Katanga--they had been the consequences of policies adopted by representatives of the US, and of the UN, up to the time of the nomination of Mr. Gardiner. Indeed, Tshombe felt that the best way to achieve a rapid and lasting settlement would be to designate jurists to prepare new constitutional drafts, which might then be presented to the parties for agreement.

Tshombe also agreed "in principle" to the integration of his forces with the Congolese Army and to the sharing of his revenues with the Central Government. He proposed, however, that UN and Katangese experts study the question of revenues and that the amnesty to be offered by the Central Government should cover all deeds and all persons connected with the developments of the past two years. Finally, Tshombe requested that the supporting powers announce solemn guarantees of the effective application of the plan.

Ambassador Gullion noted that Tshombe's reply to U Thant's plan (see item 3 September 1962) obviously contemplated new negotiations that would provide Katanga with the opportunity to continue stalling a settlement. In Gullion's opinion references to the "approaching insolvency" of the UN supported his contention that Tshombe was contemplating outlasting the UN, as well as Adoula. Gullion pointed out that even the most positive of Tshombe's statements was conditional, and applied to the principles of the constitution rather than to the concrete measures of the plan. Tshombe's response was focused on a "truly Federal Constitution," which, the Ambassador felt, was synonymous with loose confederation. Tshombe's agreement on financial measures also appeared conditional since the reference to his funds and his right to dispose of them seemed to imply that his offer to contribute to the budget referred to the net exchange available after the needs of Katanga had been met.

Gullion felt the US should be wary of agreeing to Tshombe's proposal of a guarantee by the supporting powers for the effective execution of the plan, since this might be construed as US association with the Katangese interpretation of the plan.

As a first step in a concerted effort to engage Tshombe in the implementation of the U Thant plan (see item 20 Aug 62), USUN recommended to the UN that it urge Adoula to take the various measures required of him in the plan. When this was accomplished, the UN could then urge Tshombe to start paying 50 per cent of Katangese revenues to a depository designated by Adoula. Once this "single most important step in the entire process" had been taken, then Tshombe could be urged to carry out various other steps preparatory to reaching a final settlement. Once Tshombe had taken these steps, the US reasoned, it would be difficult for him to "stall or renege" on his agreements.

At the time the shipment was delivered, Mr. Kitchen continued, the US would present a general description of the Greene Team Report to the appropriate Congolese authorities. In the meantime, the Department of State was attempting to interest other western governments in participating in the modernization of the ANC. (See item 8 Oct 62).

Robert Gardiner conveyed to Adoula and Tshombe, U Thant's satisfaction over the favorable responses they had given the UN plan. In a letter to the two leaders, Gardiner emphasized that the Secretary-General considered the responses to be complete acceptance of the plan, and that he expected that the initial steps in its implementation would be rapidly undertaken. Gardiner noted in this connection that he planned to present them with a second letter in which he would detail the UN plan for implementation (see item 11 September 1962).

A twenty-man UN force on reconnaissance patrol near Elisabethville encountered a one hundred-man Katangese force. A fire fight ensued, leaving two Katangese dead. The same evening, Tshombe summoned a UN representative and the Western consuls in Elisabethville to the local morgue where the bodies of the slain Katangese gendarmes were displayed. There, before television cameras, Tshombe proceeded to denounce the consuls as liars, to term Western guarantees worthless, and to claim that the US wished to annihilate the native population of Katanga. The next day he apologized to the consuls, but indicated that the recurrence of such incidents as the fire fight would undermine his political control.

Ambassador Gullion, acting on information that the Congo government was planning to move troops into northern Katanga, warned Adoula that such a move at this time would hurt his government by alienating US and world opinion.

Adoula indignantly replied that the movement of Congolese troops anywhere in the Congo was an internal matter and therefore not the concern of the US or the UN.

In reporting on this meeting to the Department, Gullion opined that such ANC movements would reflect Adoula's belief that the negotiations with Tshombe were certain to break down again. If negotiations did break down, Adoula wanted his forces to be deployed in positions from which they might end the Katangese secession by force.

In a conversation with Gardiner, Adoula turned down a UN request that Congolese representatives consult with Katangese and UN officials on the drafting of the new Congolese constitution. Adoula held that Tshombe's views had been made clear during their previous negotiations (see item 26 Jun 62) and in the work of the constitutional commission. The new constitution would incorporate Tshombe's views, Adoula said; when completed, it would need only to be submitted to the parliaments of the provinces for approval.

Ambassador Gullion reported to the Department of State that Adoula's position was probably based on his belief that Tshombe, aided by constant appeals to Western opinion, might succeed in having each step toward integration depend upon prior discussion, agreement, and even ratification by Katanga, of all 220 articles in the proposed constitution. Gullion, along with the UK and Belgian Ambassadors in Leopoldville, shared Adoula's opinion that Tshombe might well use this method to delay integration indefinitely.

Gullion also forwarded Gardiner's report that Adoula did not expect to secure passage of the proposed constitution by the present Congolese parliament, which was "out to get him"; he was therefore considering presenting it first to the provinces for consideration.

USUN reported that U Thant and Belgian Foreign Minister Spaak had agreed that Tshombe was unlikely to implement the reconciliation plan unless he was forced to by the termination of UMHK payments to Katanga. As a result, Gardiner had been asked to comment on a plan by which: 1) Adoula would send a letter to the UMHK saying that he expected all UMHK payments to be made to the Central Government; 2) the Congo Parliament would pass legislation requiring that all payments by the mining companies be made directly to the Central Government; 3) Adoula would ask the Belgian Government to assure UMHK compliance with the new law; 4) Adoula would request UN support; 5) the Secretary-General would elicit from the appropriate governments their help in obtaining compliance with the law; 6) the Secretary-General would request Security Council approval of his action and ask for specific authority to guard UMHK installations. OASD (ISA) forwarded to the Department of State a suggested organization for a UN military training mission in the Congo. Like the Greene Team (see items 23 Jul 62 et seq) ISA thought that the UN training effort should be separate from the operational mission of UNOC and should take care to respect Congolese sovereignty. ISA envisaged, consequently, three separate UN missions in the Congo: a Civilian Operations Mission, the UN Command in the Congo, and a UN Military Training Mission; each reporting to and subordinate to the UN Special Representative in Leopoldville.

The UN Military Training Mission, having perhaps 275 personnel as its eventual full strength, would be comprised of a commander with a small international staff, and functional sections that would be national in character (e.g., an entirely Belgian contingent might handle all training of the Army). The Mission Commander would exercise command over his immediate staff, and would be responsible for coordination of the various functions. He and his staff would have direct access to the appropriate levels of the Congolese Defense Ministry and the ANC.

Depending upon the degree to which the US participated in the UN program, it might be advisable, ISA suggested, that certain "key" positions on the Military Mission's staff, such as Deputy Commander, be held by US military officers.

Although the commissions met again the following day the sessions were reportedly unproductive because of continued Katangese insistence that Tshombe's reply to the plan had been an acceptance in principle only.

There did not seem to be any desire on the part of the GOC or the UN to engage in the commission discussions, Tshombe said. The Katangan leader also complained that the repeated provocations by UN and Congolese troops created a climate not conducive to successful negotiations. Tshombe proposed that to eliminate this obstacle to successful negotiations and restore his confidence in the good faith of the UN and the Congolese Government, all forces in Katanga return to their respective "permanent" positions. Tshombe insisted, finally, that the Central Government halt its military moves in northern Katanga--which, he charged were attempts to separate this area from the rest of the province.

(No. 56)

Under Secretary of State George McGhee met with Adoula in Leopoldville to urge him to agree to consultation with Tshombe on the proposed constitution. McGhee, who was to spend three weeks in the Congo in an attempt to hasten a Congo settlement, emphasized that US domestic considerations dictated that every opportunity be given Tshombe to implement the U Thant plan. The Under Secretary pointed out that the chance of Tshombe carrying out the plan in the absence of discussions was small, and that consultations were a prerequisite to the adoption of stronger measures by the US and UN and the other interested parties. McGhee added that he thought Tshombe's insistence on consultations was reasonable.

Adoula, as on previous occasions, rejected these arguments and said he intended to submit the constitution to the Congo Parliament immediately after his Cabinet had commented on it. The presentation to the Cabinet was scheduled for the afternoon.

During the McGhee-Adoula meeting, Congolese Minister of Education Ngalula reported on his ten days of discussions with the Katangese in Elisabethville. Ngalula maintained that the Katangese did not intend to carry out U Thant's plan and cited as evidence the fact that, despite agreement to share revenues equally between the Congo and Katanga, the Katangese held that the sharing should only take place after Katanga's needs were met. The Katangese were also insisting that the integration of the military establishments could take place only after the Congolese forces evacuated northern Katanga, the UN left Elisabethville, and "constitutional provisions re: the military" were adopted.

In conversations with McGhee the same day, the UN Chief Economist in the Congo, Badre, who had recently returned from Elisabethville, reported that he, like the Congolese, felt that Tshombe was playing for time in the expectation that the UN would soon liquidate its operation in the Congo.

In a telegram to Gardiner, Secretary-General U Thant outlined the steps contemplated by the UN to secure Tshombe's compliance with the terms of the U Thant plan. Gardiner was to make it clear that UN military forces would not leave Katanga before reunification. If it appeared that Tshombe did not intend to implement the plan, the

The Central Congolese Government began military operations in South Kasai Province to end the secessionist movement that had been active in the province for the past two years. On the following day the UN reported that government forces had taken effective control of Bakwanga, capital of South Kasai, and had arrested secessionist leader Albert Kalonji.

In assessing the significance of the Congolese action Ambassador Gullion pointed out that the "victory" would boost the morale of the Central Government and strengthen Adoula in his relations with his political opposition. Gullion also thought that the government's action would have a chastening effect on Tshombe by removing his principal "ally," Kalonji, and by demonstrating the capability of the Congolese army for effective planning and action.

(No. 59)

As Under Secretary McGhee prepared to depart Leopoldville for Elisabethville and talks with Tshombe, Adoula told the Under Secretary that he thought his visit to Elisabethville would impede a settlement of the Katanga problem by delaying implementation of the U Thant plan. Adoula believed that, if the plan should fail or its implementation be delayed, his government would fall and more radical elements would take its place. He warned that the U Thant plan was the last effort at a solution through negotiation that he could support and that, if the plan failed, he would be obliged to attempt to resolve the problem by the use of force. He also noted that if the plan failed, and he thought it would, those who took over the Congo would turn to another source (presumably the Soviet Union) for aid.

In addition, Adoula expressed interest in the Greene Team recommendations and in the forthcoming shipment of military goods to the Congolese army (see item 14 Sep 62). Adoula thought that the US should begin now to supply aid in order to preclude other nations from doing so. Finally, the Premier believed that Tshombe and other secessionists would forego their plans only when they knew that a capable Congolese force existed.

McGhee replied briefly that his trip to Elisabethville was necessary, since he had come to the Congo to make on-the-spot observations and to express personally to both sides US determination to see the plan through.

On the same day, at his first meeting with Tshombe, McGhee expressed US concern over the possible weakening of the Central Government because of political intrigue against the Adoula regime and the protracted negotiations over the U Thant plan. The Under Secretary pointed out that, if Adoula's position were seriously undermined, he might seek non-Western help and more radical means to bring an end to the Katangese secession. Such an eventuality, McGhee said, would bring far more suffering to Katanga than the successful implementation of the U Thant plan. He therefore urged Tshombe to cooperate in implementing the plan before Adoula's situation deteriorated further.

McGhee concluded his discussion with Tshombe by saying that the US could not tolerate a divided Congo and was determined to support the reconciliation plan by every appropriate means. He warned that if he went back to Washington and was unable to convince the US government of Tshombe's willingness to carry out the plan, the US would, of necessity, be obliged to consider the alternative policies available.

In response to an inquiry from Under Secretary McGhee, the Department of State set forth the measures the US was prepared to adopt to aid the UMHK in the event that the company was adversely affected by its cooperation in the Spaak-U Thant proposal (see item 25 Sep 62). First, the Department said, the US could loan the UMHK 119,000 tons of copper. This amount of copper was in excess of the maximum US stockpile objective. This represented five months' production of the UMHK. Furthermore, as compensation for physical damage to UMHK installations, the US might supplement assistance from the Congolese and Belgian governments and loans from the Export-Import Bank by:

1) making import aid grants to the UN for the Government of the Congo, to provide a source of foreign exchange for imports of US replacement equipment for the UMHK;

2) providing PL 480, "Food for Peace," supplies for unemployed or uprooted African workers;

3) loaning counterpart funds generated by agricultural assistance programs, to help finance the cost of reconstruction and of payments to unemployed UMHK workers and officers.

In a letter to ASD (ISA), the Deputy Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs reported that the Department of State shared the view of the Department of Defense (see items 8 and 23 Aug 62) that the Greene Team Report (see item 23 Jul 62) was basically sound and consistent with US policy objectives in the Congo. The Department of State agreed further that early action should be taken on the report; to this end, the US Embassy in Leopoldville would be instructed, in accordance with the recommendations of the Department of Defense, to present the concept of the Greene Team Report to the GOC (see item 25 Oct 62).

The Department of State had serious doubts, however, regarding the advisability of administering military assistance to the Congo bilaterally, as both ISA and the JCS recommended. Rather, the retraining and reorganization of the Congolese Armed Forces should be an international program under UN aegis until such time as the UN withdrew from the Congo. The establishment of a conventional MDAP agreement with the GOC would only highlight in an undesirable way the close connections of the Adoula regime with the US, and could provoke Soviet or other Communist offers of military assistance. A conventional bilateral assistance program might become advisable in the future, but for the present the US should promote a UN program which would, at least in its early stages, give the appearance of a UN development and administration. The US could contribute to this program in a manner to be agreed upon with the UN. When other nations began to participate in the UN program, and if substantial US material aid were necessary to the program, then it might be advisable for the US to make bilateral arrangements with the GOC. (See item 17 Dec 62).

(No. 65)

After concluding his talks in Elisabethville, Under Secretary of State George McGhee submitted a report to the Department of State in which he sought to assess Tshombe's position in Katanga and the causes of recent Katangese actions. The unreliability of Katangan policy did not stem simply from Tshombe's personal preferences, McGhee said, but was primarily the result of pressures exerted on Tshombe by the political forces within Katanga from which he drew his support. The primary source of influence on Tshombe, according to McGhee, was the group of approximately 15,000 Belgians in Katanga who had remained in the province after Congolese independence and who now enjoyed great prosperity which they felt depended upon the success of the secession. The leaders of this group were, moreover, able to exert a strong influence on the governments of Belgium and other European nations. As individuals the members of this group were interested only in making "a killing" and attached little importance to the long range prospects of Katanga. Consequently, they felt that they could only lose from a Katangese association with the Congo, which while offering no immediate advantage, would result in the diversion of revenue and foreign exchange from the province, restrictions on their freedom to remit foreign exchange, higher taxes, "loss of freedom," and erosion of the Katangese government's administrative efficiency. A second pressure felt by Tshombe, McGhee said, came from indigenous Katangese who had undergone a "nationalist transformation" during the Katanga-Congo dispute, and who thus did not want to be submerged in the Congo, whose tribes were, in fact, their traditional rivals. There was, according to McGhee, no doubt of Tshombe's popular support among either the Katangese or the Belgians.

McGhee thought that Tshombe was personally sincere in his willingness to accept union with the Congo along extremely loose federal lines, but that each step he took toward integration in accordance with the UN plan evoked the sharp opposition of some group in Katanga. In any event, McGhee thought it clear that Tshombe would not carry out the hard decisions he had promised unless the alternatives were even more distasteful.

In describing US policy in the Congo, McGhee noted that it was not based on the merits of Tshombe's or Adoula's position. A righting of the wrongs in the Congo by the US, McGhee thought, was as impossible as it was irrelevant. The US supported Adoula not because he was "right," but because his aims coincided with the US objective of Congo unification. If, for whatever reason, Tshombe proved unwilling or unable to carry out the U Thant plan, the US must acknowledge that its tactics had failed and move on to stronger measures.

(No. 66)

UN headquarters made public a report from UNOC regarding the build-up of aircraft and mercenaries in Katanga. The UNOC report presented evidence of the construction of new and better runways in Katanga, the employment of at least 14 and probably nearly 50 mercenaries in the Katangan air force, and the purchase by Katanga of 15 new aircraft.

A coalition of Congolese nationalist parties condemned the U Thant plan and Adoula's acceptance of it as a surrender to secessionists and a betrayal of the long term interests of the Congo. The nationalists objected especially to the proposed federal constitution; it, they said, together with "rising tribalism" and the "extreme weakness" of Adoula's government, would bring about the "accelerated decline" of central authority over the provinces.

(No. 68)

DIA estimated for OASD (ISA) the capabilities of military forces in the Congo, as follows:

1. Congolese National Army. Despite some progress in reorganization by General Mobutu, the ANC was still an undisciplined, poorly trained, and unreliable force. Its logistical support functions were extremely weak, and the condition of its equipment was generally poor. The weaknesses of the ANC would, moreover, be magnified in any attempt at operations against Katanga, inasmuch as problems of distance, terrain, and transport would all have to be overcome. It was highly doubtful whether outside military assistance--from whatever source and of whatever form--could appreciably enhance the capabilities of the ANC at any early date.

2. Katangan Gendarmerie. The Katangan Gendarmerie had expanded in recent months to an estimated strength of 18,000 men, and had been augmented by additional mercenaries and aircraft. The morale of the gendarmerie seemed good, its loyalties undivided. Training under mercenary supervision was proceeding at an increased tempo. The Katangan gendarmerie was considered capable of conducting successful defensive operations against the ANC anywhere in Katanga.

3. UN Forces. The UN force was estimated at 13,620, of which 9,600 were located in Katanga. As presently organized and supported, the UN forces were not equipped to engage in effective military operations outside Elisabethville. If, however, the UN forces were given additional support and freedom of military action, including air support, they would have a "good" chance of ending organized Katangan military resistance.

(No. 69)

Tshombe accepted most of the proposals made by McGhee on 6 October (see item), but gave only qualified approval to the remainder. The proposals Tshombe agreed to without reservations were: 1) immediate deposit of a sizable sum to the credit of the Congo Government, 2) resumption of traffic over the Lubilash bridge, 3) release of nonmilitary UN equipment held by Katanga, 4) furnishing full information on Katangan foreign exchange and revenue to the commissions, 5) speed-up of the work of the commissions, and 6) the opening of telecommunications with Leopoldville.

In regard to the remainder of the proposals McGhee had made--for the continued implementation of the U Thant plan while awaiting the promulgation of the constitution, and for the institution of a cease-fire and a cessation of military movement--Tshombe said that he would agree to them only if the UN roadblocks at Elisabethville and the Congolese-UN forces at Kamina were withdrawn. He also said that he expected the proposed military standstill would apply to UN troops as well as to indigenous forces. Finally, Tshombe agreed to have his officers take an oath of loyalty to President Kasavubu but only "within the framework of a federal army . . . organized on the basis of a constitutional regime."

On the following day, in a statement to the consuls in Elisabethville, Tshombe announced that he had taken or would shortly take action to: open the Lubilash bridge, deposit two million dollars to the credit of the Congo, reopen telecommunications with Leopoldville, accelerate the work of the commissions, and provide figures on foreign exchange and revenues to the appropriate Commission.

Reporting Tshombe's reply to the Department of State, McGhee observed that the concessions were calculated to buy time and regain the "psychological initiative," at a minimum cost. McGhee found Tshombe's conditional acceptances of little worth, and his inclusion of UN forces in the standstill agreement completely unacceptable.

(No. 70)

A State Department analysis of the new constitution drafted for the Congo by an international panel of jurists (see item 26 Sep 62) indicated that, if the national government exercised all the potential powers of the constitution, the Congo would have a highly centralized form of federal government, leaving the provinces little more autonomy than they presently had. Tshombe, the Department thought, could reject it on the plausible grounds that it did not grant the degree of local autonomy called for in the U Thant plan.

To meet this problem, the Department thought that Adoula should be persuaded not to identify himself with the draft constitution, but rather to present it to the provincial presidents as simply the work of the UN experts and as having no official standing. He should also leave the way open for Tshombe to submit his views on how the draft might be modified. The US would, on its part, act through the UN to get the draft constitution modified.

Under Secretary McGhee met with Congo President Kasavubu and urged him to respond to the concessions that Tshombe had announced (see item 10 Oct 62) with actions that would demonstrate the good faith of the Congo government. McGhee also suggested to Kasavubu that the Congo government treat the draft constitution as merely a UN suggestion, subject to changes based on the views of the representatives of the various provinces (see item 11 Oct 62).

ASD (ISA) directed the attention of the JCS to Ambassador Gullion's warning of possible military contingencies in the Congo (see item 28 Sep 62), commenting that it now seemed advisable for the US to begin planning for them. Accordingly, ISA requested the views of the JCS on:

1. US military support required to assist in a phased or precipitate withdrawal of all UN forces from the Congo.
2. The nature and extent of US military intervention in the Congo to restore order.
 - a. With assistance from present UN forces.
 - b. Without assistance from UN forces but in coordination with Congolese forces.
 - c. Without assistance from UN forces, and with total collapse of organized Congolese forces.

Tshombe supplemented the concessions which he had earlier announced (see item 10 Oct 62), by offering new proposals concerning a cease-fire and standstill arrangement for military forces, a draft loyalty oath, and plans concerning the transfer of foreign exchange and revenues.

These proposals were taken up by the "constitutional commission in session in Elisabethville, where, despite UN efforts, the Central Congolese Government agreed only to 1) a cease-fire arrangement covering Congolese and Katangese forces in North Katanga, and 2) the adoption of a resolution by the Foreign Exchange Commission by which Katanga agreed to make information on the Katangan economy available to the Commission. (Even these agreements were repudiated by Adoula on 17 October; see item.)

Ambassador Gullion informed the State Department that even the limited agreements which had been reached between the Congo and Katanga were in a precarious position because of internal Congolese opposition. The pressure exerted by the UN to bring about the recent agreements had caused resentment among the members of the Congolese government, who believed that the agreements would lead to a further prolongation of negotiations. According to Gullion, members of the Congo Cabinet were insisting that Adoula repudiate the accords reached with Katanga at Elisabethville and ask the UN to leave the Congo. Some were suggesting that the Congo government turn elsewhere for aid.

In a radio broadcast Adoula accused the UN and "certain consular missions" of pressuring the Congolese negotiators in Elisabethville, and announced that the Congo government would not adhere to the agreements reached at Elisabethville (see item 12-16 October 1962). These agreements, Adoula asserted, were contrary to the provisions of the UN plan. Adoula also said that his government would no longer tolerate delays in settling the Katangese problem and would take all measures necessary to "face up to the situation"; the need for immediate action was made even more imperative inasmuch as the Katangese gendarmerie had lately been "pushing its operations" in North Katanga. (See items 19 and 20 Oct 62.)

(U) Msgs, Leopoldville to SecState, 946, 961, 18 Oct 62.

19 Oct 62
(No. 76)

In a message to Brussels and other posts, the State Department outlined and explained the US conviction that a substantial grant of economic assistance to the Congo might be useful in solving the Katanga problem.

The US was determined, the Department said, to bring about the peaceful reintegration of Katanga, but it wished to avoid the use of economic pressures against Katanga or a military build-up of Congolese forces. On the other hand, the US was also unwilling to see the U Thant plan fail merely because Tshombe had "announced his willingness to make progress towards integration at a different speed and in a different manner than was envisaged under the plan."

The Department thought that a peaceful solution to the problem would require that Adoula make further concessions to Katanga, especially on the issue of the constitution. Prolongation of negotiations and the granting of greater concessions to Tshombe would, however, seriously jeopardize Adoula's political position. It was necessary, therefore, to strengthen Adoula so that he could withstand the pressures of further compromise and delay. The best available method of accomplishing this was to increase economic aid to the Congo so that Adoula could demonstrate to the Congolese Parliament and public that his policy of cooperation with the UN and the West was beneficial to the country. It was hoped that Adoula, thus fortified, could then be induced to adopt a "constructive position" toward reunification.

In addition, the Department noted, extensive foreign aid for the Congo could be justified on purely economic grounds.

In light of the above the US government was convinced that the immediate announcement of a plan to make substantial foreign aid available to all of the Congo had become a vital element in the solution of the Congo crisis. The US was therefore proposing that a $50 million fund in input grants and credits to the Congolese government be created, in addition to US food shipments. Of this sum the US was prepared to announce the availability of $25 million, and expected the Belgian government to undertake to provide about $15 million more, with the rest to be supplied by Great Britain, Germany, and Italy. (See items 31 Oct and 3 Nov 62.)

(No. 77)

The US Ambassador in Brussels reported that Adoula's action in rejecting the Elisabethville accords (see item 17 Oct 62) had produced a hostile reaction toward the Congo regime in the Belgian press and in business and Parliamentary circles--all of whom felt that Adoula's action had thwarted Tshombe's sincere attempt to achieve a peaceful settlement. In view of this situation the Ambassador thought that it would be extremely difficult for Belgian Foreign Minister Spaak to obtain government support (see item 25 Sep 62) for the application of economic pressures on Tshombe.

(C) Msg, Brussels to SecState, 629, 19 Oct 62.

20 Oct 62
(No. 78)

In a report prepared at the request of the State Department, Ambassador Gullion sought to explain Adoula's repudiation of the recent agreements reached in Elisabethville (see item 17 Oct 62). Adoula's action, according to Gullion, resulted principally from his own misgivings, and those of many other Congolese leaders, that the proposed accords would adversely affect the speedy execution of the U Thant plan. All of the Congo cabinet and most of the members of the Congolese Parliament, Gullion pointed out, felt that first step compromise measures, such as those proposed by Tshombe (see items 10 and 12-16 Oct 62) would only serve to delay reaching a real solution. Moreover, the Congolese generally did not appreciate the importance of world opinion and were thus unreceptive to UN and US entreaties to make concessions to Tshombe for propaganda effect.

Gullion thought that despite his fundamental opposition to the Elisabethville proposals, Adoula might have accepted them if it had not been for the pressure exerted on him by his political supporters, who had violently opposed the concessions in order to demonstrate to the Congolese extremists that they were sufficiently zealous in defending Congolese rights and interests.

(No. 79)

The President formally approved the recommendations of the Greene Team Report (see item 23 Jul 62). Immediately messages were sent to Leopoldville and New York, instructing US officials to present the report to the UN and then, assuming UN approval, to urge the GOC to request such a program from the UN. Specifically, the GOC should request the UN to:

1. Institute a broad program for modernization and training of the ANC.
2. Organize a small international military staff to monitor the program.
3. Provide or assist in obtaining six advisory personnel for the Congolese air force, and assist in implementing a reorganization of the air force.
4. Secure a civilian educator as temporary advisor to the Congolese General Staff on matters of troop education and provide or assist in obtaining advisors to the GOC to assist in establishing a Military Academy.

5. Urge Belgium to continue and expand its present military assistance program.

6. Establish an English language training program in the Congo.

7. Secure or assist in obtaining advisors to the Congolese naval element.

8. Provide or assist in obtaining six civilian or military surgeons, and military pharmaceutical and supply technicians, to assist in the reorganization and expansion of the Congolese military medical service.

The Leopoldville and New York posts were asked to discuss the program with UN officials and secure UN approval as soon as possible. The US officials were not, however, to promise any material support for the program at this time; the US would commit itself to material aid only after demonstrated improvement by the ANC. (See item 26 Oct 62.)

The US Embassy in Leopoldville was further requested to recommend the best means for presenting the US proposals to the GOC as well as any other suggestions for strengthening Adoula's position. (See item 26-27 Oct 62.)

In a message to the Secretary of State, the Congo Country Team listed the "main needs" of UNOC for decreasing its vulnerability and freeing the US from the continual danger of "sudden rescue calls." According to the Country Team, UNOC should have, in addition to its present force, the following:

1. one "genuine" paratroop battalion with its own airlift and quartermaster company;
2. one armored car battalion with airlift;
3. one-half squadron of fighters (12) with a "full range of armaments";
4. one engineering bridge company.

McGhee told the Belgian Ambassador in Washington that the US could not accept the defeat of Adoula. In fact, the US was designing policies to bolster Adoula's position and to bring additional pressures to bear on Tshombe in the event that progress was not achieved on the U Thant plan. McGhee also noted that the US was presently moving toward the implementation of the re-training program outlined in the Greene Team Report (see items 23 Jul and 25 Oct 62), and was programming $50 million in Congo aid, $25 million of which was to be used in the following six months. He urged the Belgian Government to cooperate in the aid program.

The US proposal for the modernization and training of the ANC and the program for implementing this proposal (see item 25 Oct 62) were given to Brigadier Rikhye, the Secretary General's Military Advisor. In subsequent days, both the Brigadier and Under Secretary-General Bunche indicated their general concurrence with the plan. The UN refused, however, to give formal approval to the plan until it had received a formal proposal from either the US or the GOC (see items 20 and 28 Dec 62).

(No. 84)

In two messages to the Department of State the US Embassy in the Congo recommended the manner it considered best for presenting to the GOC the US proposals for re-training the ANC (as requested; see item 25 Oct 62). The principal GOC interest in any reorganization of the ANC was material, the Embassy said. Without doubt, the ANC was in much greater need of training and organization, but its leaders did not think so. To foster the essential training and organization, therefore, it was very important that the US make it clear that material aid would also be part of the program. The best way for the US to do this at the present moment, the Embassy thought, would be to underwrite an increased civil air contract carrier for the GOC. If this were done, the objections that the GOC would have to the plan--multilateral participation, UN control, and seeming expansion of Belgian influence--might be overcome (see item 26 Dec 62).

As the Department had requested, the Embassy also proposed several other US actions that could buttress the position of the GOC, including:

1. Continued reassurance to the GOC that the US supported the U Thant plan.
2. Announcement, as soon as possible, of as much of the proposed $50 million aid program as could be assured (see items 31 Oct and 3 Nov 62).
3. Increased grants to the GOC of agricultural surplus goods (see item 3 Nov 62).
4. Subject to Adoula's permission, an aerial and/or naval show of force in, or visit to the Congo.
5. A visit to the Congo by a high-ranking US personage, such as the Vice President.
6. Removal from the US of Michel Struelens, Katanga's propagandist. (See item 6 Dec 62.)
7. Increased publicity in the US of mounting US support for the GOC.
8. A major propaganda program, overt and covert, in the Congo, on the behalf of the GOC.

(No. 85)

The US elaborated to Congolese Foreign Minister Justin Bomboko the steps it was willing to take to support the GOC, together with the steps it expected the GOC to take toward unification.

The US was willing, Bomboko was told:

1. To contribute, over the next six months, $25 million to finance imports to the Congo (see item 3 Nov 62), and to urge other interested governments to add a like amount.
2. To urge the International Monetary Fund to send a team to the Congo to aid in integration of currency.
3. To support a plan for training and modernizing the ANC (see item 25 Oct 62).

4. To furnish substantial military equipment to the ANC, as quickly as such equipment could be assimilated by the modernization program.

5. To offer the GOC a new Food for Peace shipment (see item 3 Nov 62).

6. To provide funds for the immediate delivery by Panama Airways (the GOC contract carrier) of additional transport aircraft (see item 26 Dec 62).

In taking these actions, the US hoped and expected that the GOC would for its part take the following actions:

1. Initiate new direct negotiations with Katanga, including immediate talks aimed at putting tripartite observation teams in North Katanga and other areas of political conflict.

2. Faithfully support the "cease-fire and stand-fast" efforts of the UN in North Katanga (see following item).

3. Issue forthwith an amnesty for Katangese and thereafter facilitate by every means the execution of their oath of loyalty to the GOC.

4. Cooperate in the development of a realistic plan for integration of Katangan armed forces.

5. Adopt a more realistic and flexible attitude in foreign exchange currency negotiations.

6. Facilitate cooperative arrangements with the Katangese in such matters as telecommunications, customs, and immigration.

7. Make a public statement of confidence in the ultimate success of the reconciliation plan and peaceful integration of Katanga.

8. Cooperate fully in the execution of a broad program of modernization and training for the ANC.

9. Facilitate consideration of the new constitution by the Congolese Parliament.

Bomboko's reply to this demarche was twofold: 1) he insisted that the GOC had carried out its obligation, and that it remained for Tshombe to demonstrate good faith; and 2) he expressed appreciation for US actions. The Congolese Minister felt, that the US should, in addition to present assistance, supply a few combat aircraft to the ANC, in order to provide the GOC with the means of exerting additional pressure on Tshombe. US officials gave him no hope that such aircraft would be provided.

(On the following day, the US made a similar presentation to Adoula. Adoula was very receptive to the US proposals and was especially impressed by the prospective arrangements with Air Panama. He also indicated that he intended to cooperate with the UN on a number of outstanding issues, including arrangements for a military standfast.)

The US learned that, after a trip to the Congo, Bunche was "optimistic for the first time" and convinced that the problem could be resolved before the end of the year. Bunche now felt that the UN had many "ways and places" to "hurt" Tshombe if he refused to cooperate. (See items 2, 6, 7, and 9 Nov 62.)

According to Bunche, Adoula was "delinquent on a couple of counts" in the implementation of the U Thant plan. Tshombe, however, had "done nothing," and consequently bore most of the blame for the lack of progress. The UN planned, Bunche said, to jog both Adoula and Tshombe with letters reviewing the areas toward implementation and lack thereof (see item 2 Nov 62).

(C) Msg, USUN to SecState, 1571, 31 Oct 62.

2 Nov 62
(No. 88)

In a message to USUN, the State Department expressed its concern that the UN seemed to be adopting an interpretation of the U Thant plan different from that held by the US. Referring to recent indications that the UN would soon proceed to stronger measures to end Katanga's secession (see item 31 Oct 62), the Department emphasized that the US would not at this time support UN attempts to utilize economic or military coercion against Katanga, unless there was adequate Katangese provocation and prior consultation between the US and the UN.

The US did not believe, the Department said, that attempts at reaching a negotiated settlement had been exhausted. The announcement of plans for a forced settlement at this time would only destroy the progress that had recently been made, by encouraging Adoula to withhold the concessions necessary to reach a solution.

The US also questioned the timing of the proposed application of stronger measures. In view of the Cuban crisis, and the preoccupation of India with its border dispute, the time was particularly inopportune to provoke or risk the outbreak of hostilities in the Congo. Further, an increase in economic pressure would depend to a large extent on Belgium, and recent evidence of Belgian reluctance to undertake new measures in the Congo (see item 2 Nov 62) suggested that such pressure was at present impractical.

(When Bunche learned later in the day that the US was apprehensive about UN intentions in the Congo, he expressed "astonishment." See, however, items 6, 7, and 9 November 1962.)

Gardiner, acting on behalf of the Secretary General, sent identical letters to Adoula and Tshombe reviewing the status of the U Thant plan and indicating those phases of the plan that remained to be implemented.

Gardiner began by pointing out that the plan had been submitted for acceptance, and that prolonged discussion and negotiation were contrary to the Secretary-General's intent and were in fact insuring the failure of the plan. Although some progress had been made, there had been no real beginning toward the execution of the plan. Gardiner then evaluated the progress that had been made in the various areas covered by the plan as follows:

1. Constitution: now scheduled for presentation to the Congolese Parliament, with GOC support, in November. It was hoped that the views of the provinces would be presented when the Parliament and provincial assemblies considered it.
2. Foreign exchange: Katanga's claim that its needs would have to be covered before it would deposit its receipts with the Monetary Council was not in conformity with the plan. The Monetary Council was the proper body to determine what was essential for Katanga.
3. Revenues: Katanga was understood to be offering 25 to 30 per cent of its revenues, which was not in accordance with the plan.
4. Monetary: no progress had been made on unifying the Congo's currency in spite of the time limits set by the plan.
5. Military: the early or immediate oath-taking by the Katangan gendarmerie called for by the plan was being held up by Katangan insistence that it was conditional on the proclamation of an amnesty. In addition, no progress had been made toward the creation of a plan for military integration (and the time limit set by the plan would not be met).
6. Foreign Office: contrary to the plan, Katanga maintained its Ministry of Foreign Affairs and its agents abroad.
7. Amnesty: no progress.
8. Cooperation with the UN: Katanga had not expelled its mercenaries or permitted the free movement of the UN in south Katanga.
9. Reconstitution of the Central Government: no progress.

Gardiner asked the two leaders to reply immediately; he did not, however, set a time limit for their replies.

The Belgian Government informed the State Department that it was disturbed by the UN view that the new Congo draft constitution (see item 11 Oct 62) was fully consistent with the UN reconciliation plan and provided adequate autonomy for the provinces.

The Belgians shared the State Department view that the draft constitution provided an even more centralized form of government than existed under present laws, and that therefore Tshombe would not accept and should not be expected to accept it without modification.

The Belgian Government was also unhappy to learn that in the event that replies to Gardiner's letter (see item 2 Nov 62) were unsatisfactory, U Thant intended to call a meeting of the Security Council for the purpose of obtaining authority to take further steps toward securing Katangan integration. The Belgian Government indicated that it had no intention of committing itself in advance to any further steps contemplated by U Thant.

McGhee urged Tshombe to "put aside any thought of blame" for the current situation in the Congo, and to take steps to implement those parts of the UN plan which Gardiner had indicated remained to be implemented (see item 2 Nov 62). Specifically the Under Secretary urged Tshombe to:

1. Release nonmilitary UN supplies.
2. Make provisional payment of foreign exchange to the Monetary Council on a regular monthly basis, until final arrangements were completed.
3. Make provisional payment of revenues to the Central Government on a regular monthly basis, until final arrangements were worked out by the Commission.
4. Have Katangan military leaders take the oath of allegiance to the Central Government.
5. Close the Katangan Foreign Ministry and overseas offices.
6. Accept a new deadline for the completion by the Military Commission of a plan for the integration of the armed forces.
7. Cooperate with the Central Government personnel

Special Adviser to the President, Chester Bowles, took time out from an official tour of Africa to apprise the State Department of his views on the Congo situation, particularly as it related to US relations with the nations of Africa. Bowles reported that recent US actions relative to the Congo had stirred feelings in the African countries ranging from concern to bitterness and disillusionment over the probable results of US policy. Bowles agreed with the consensus expressed in the African nations that he had visited that Tshombe was stalling on a settlement that he had no intention of consummating. He felt that if, despite its strong declarations in support of a settlement, the US failed to back the UN in getting Tshombe to take immediate irreversible steps toward integration, then it would suffer a grave political defeat in both Africa and Asia.

Bowles outlined several possible results of US inaction. The seeming reluctance of the US to carry through on the implementation of the U Thant plan, recognized by Africans as a US "brain child," would result in a general anti-US reaction throughout the Afro-Asian nations. India and Nigeria would probably withdraw then from the UN force. The complete collapse of the UN effort under these circumstances, Bowles thought, could set the stage for the bloody, bitter division of Africa between the anti-West forces led by the USSR and the "white supremacists" supported by a Welensky-Salazar-Verwoerd coalition. It was generally believed in Africa, Bowles noted, that consultations among the "white supremacists" were already taking place to provide a well-armed and politically coordinated force to cope with the coming crisis.

Bowles suggested that in order to avoid the unfortunate results of continued indecisiveness, the US should encourage and bolster Adoula's position, publicly support the prompt implementation of the U Thant plan, and appeal to Tshombe to take positive steps toward a solution. In addition Bowles recommended that the US strengthen UN forces in the Congo with an airborne battalion, engineers, and additional fighter aircraft. The paratroops, Bowles suggested, could be used to set up tax collection points along the route used for the transport of copper from Katanga to Angola.

Bowles recommended that if Tshombe continued to stall, the US should support the imposition of effective economic sanctions, and if necessary as a last resort, the use of armed force by effectively reinforced UN troops

The Department of State announced that the US Government had decided to make $25 million available to the GOC to finance imports.

The Department revealed at the same time that, on the previous day, the US and GOC had agreed to a $2.67 million shipment of agricultural commodities under the Food for Peace Program. These goods were to be sold in the Congo for local currency, the proceeds to be applied by the UN to the economic development of the Congo.

U Thant told a CAC meeting that time was running out on the implementation of the UN plan. The Secretary-General indicated that if satisfactory replies to Gardiner's letters to Adoula and Tshombe (see item 2 Nov 62) were not received by 15 November, he would consider the plan "scrapped," and seek alternative solutions.

Following the Secretary-General's remarks, Bunche told the meeting that the UMHK and mercenary strongholds at Jadotville, Kolwezi, and Kipushi could be brought under UN control, and that he thought this could be accomplished peacefully.

(No. 97)

The President approved a "Proposed Contingency Plan for the Congo" prepared by the State Department for the eventuality that the present UN efforts to renew progress toward implementation of the UN plan were unsuccessful. Under the plan, the US, in consultation with the UN, Belgium, and UK, would attempt to strengthen the UN posture and the Adoula Government in an effort to convince Tshombe that his continued stalling would not be fruitful. These measures would be accompanied by efforts to persuade Adoula and Tshombe to resume work on the implementation of the UN plan, and by the UN presenting an outline of the specific steps it expected both parties to take. Tshombe would be expected to release blocked UN supplies, have his military take the oath to the GOC, begin regular payments of revenue and foreign exchange, accept the establishment of a GOC customs station in Elisabethville, close down his Foreign Ministry, and grant the UN freedom of movement in South Katanga. Adoula for his part, would be expected to facilitate parliamentary consideration of the new constitution subject to Katangese modifications, issue an amnesty, and adopt a more flexible approach to the problems of the military and economic commissions.

In order to strengthen the credibility of UNOC, US Air Force cargo planes would be supplied to UN to transport equipment to Elisabethville. An attempt would be made to get fighter squadrons from European nations to supplement the UN air forces or, that failing, to send US aircraft, manned by foreign pilots. Efforts would also be made to get additional troops for the UN, if needed.

In order to strengthen Adoula and US influence on him the US should accelerate the implementation of the Greene Team Report (see item 23 July 1962 et seq), and attempt to get foreign financial support for the Congo to supplement US aid. In order to deprive Katanga of the remaining indications of independence, moreover, direct postal and telecommunications to Katanga should be cut off, and Katangans required to use Congolese passports.

Tshombe and Adoula would be advised, finally, that in the event that Tshombe did not carry out the measures requested of him within a definite period of time (one month was suggested), Belgian technicians would be withdrawn from Katanga, and Belgian companies operating in Katanga would be requested to pay their taxes directly to the GOC. (These steps, the plan admitted, would require the prior approval of the UN and Belgium, and the acquiescence of the UK.)

The State Department plan noted by way of conclusion that, although the US preferred to avoid the risks inherent in the pursuit of its recommendations, it believed that these risks were preferable to the dangers that would arise from the collapse of the UN effort.

In approving the Contingency Plan the President directed that discussions be initiated with the Belgians on the question of sanctions against Tshombe (see items 27 and 29 Nov 62).

7 Nov 62
(No. 98)

In a conversation with Assistant Secretary of State Cleveland, Under Secretary-General Bunche revealed more facets of the new inflexible UN view of the Congo problem (see item 6 Nov 62). Bunche stressed first of all, the difficulties that the UN was experiencing with Adoula because of his inflexible attitude concerning negotiation with Tshombe. In the face of such adamant opposition, Bunche said, the UN was not prepared to involve itself, as the US wished, in further mediation between Adoula and Tshombe on the constitutional issue. At any rate, Bunche observed, the US emphasis on the constitutional settlement was probably exaggerated, since Tshombe too had recently indicated a lack of interest in the problem.

Bunche was generally optimistic about a successful resolution of the Congo situation. He thought that Tshombe was losing ground, inasmuch as he had permanently lost North Katanga and did not even have full control of Elisabethville. Furthermore, the UN had been strengthened militarily by the use of Congolese troops for peace-keeping functions. Bunche predicted the gradual attrition of Tshombe's position, and said it would not be long before the UN would be in Kolwezi and Jadotville.

The UN official admitted, nevertheless, that the UN force was seriously weakened by the withdrawal of the Ethiopian F-86s. Requests had been made, however, to Greece and the Philippines for replacements; the US, Bunche hoped, would support these requests.

Bunche went on to say that no specific action was contemplated when the 15 November deadline mentioned by U Thant (see item 6 November 1962) expired. He also sought to correct the impression conveyed by U Thant that the UN was prepared to abandon the U Thant plan entirely if the replies to Gardiner's letters (see item 2 November 1962) proved unsatisfactory. Bunche said that in this event the UN intended to consult the US, Belgium and the UK regarding future steps--either within the framework of the plan's "courses of action" or in the form of new measures to be proposed by the UN. Bunche pointed out, however, that the new steps envisaged would be carried out by the GOC and the UN without outside help, or by the UN alone if this proved necessary. Although Bunche avoided specifying the steps contemplated in the event new action was decided upon, he did suggest that they would involve the establishment of a GOC customs and immigration agency at the UN-controlled Elisabethville airport.

On the following day, commenting on Bunche's remarks, USUN informed the State Department that the UN Secretariat appeared "prepared to initiate real pressure on Tshombe with or without US, Belgium and UK support," although these governments would probably be consulted before any action was undertaken. The UN Secretariat said that it had sufficient forces at its disposal to establish GOC customs and immigration services at Elisabethville, while at the same time curtailing the expected Katangese reaction to this step and thus avoiding major fighting.

9 Nov 62
(No. 99)

In an interview with U Thant, Under Secretary McGhee made it clear that the US expected the UN to make a "convincing case" that Tshombe had been given a "fair deal" before it resorted to actions which might lead to a renewal of hostilities. McGhee said that the US was not opposed to exerting pressure on Tshombe to get him to carry out the plan, and that he was himself going to Brussels to get Belgian support for such measures. He noted, however, that neither the US nor Belgium was willing to force Tshombe to accept an extreme formula that would leave him no alternative but to resist the UN with force.

McGhee pointed out that by adopting a moderate stand on the constitutional and revenue issues, the UN would demonstrate to the Western world that Tshombe had been given an opportunity to accept a reasonable constitution. If under these circumstances Tshombe refused to cooperate, further UN action would be obviously justified.

On the problem of Katanga's payment of foreign exchange receipts to the Central Government, McGhee suggested that the UN assure Tshombe that Katanga would receive a fair share of funds automatically, in accordance with a guaranteed agreement. This assurance would dispose of a major Katangese objection to the implementation of the UN plan. As for the constitution, McGhee suggested that the UN support a modification of the prepared draft (see item 11 October 1962), which would allow Katanga a degree of autonomy within a Congolese federation.

In a conversation with the US Consul in Elisabethville, Gardiner stated that the situation had passed the stage where compromise was possible, for there was no hope that Adoula would make concessions to Tshombe. When the US Consul cited the reluctance of the Western powers to undertake measures which might entail the use of force, Gardiner replied that the powers no longer had a choice in the matter. He pointed out that the US had developed the U Thant plan, including the courses of action, and could not now abandon its own creation. Further, US abandonment of the plan would result in the withdrawal of the UN, thus leaving the way open for Soviet intervention.

The impression the US Consul gained from this conversation was that the UN was declaring its independence of Tshombe, Adoula, and to some extent even of the Western powers, and was now determined to settle the Congo problem--alone if necessary. The Consul commented that the UN appeared to be giving Tshombe a choice between capitulation and economic sanctions, with no room for a gradual negotiated settlement; the Consul himself felt that this might in fact be the only practical course of action for the UN to take.

Acting on orders from Bunche, Gardiner supplemented his letters of 2 November (see item) to Adoula and Tshombe by presenting them with a list of specific actions which the UN expected them to take as tangible evidence of their intention to adhere to the UN plan.

The new request called on Adoula to: 1) permit the UN to give Tshombe a copy of the constitution; 2) assure the safety of the Katangan officers proceeding to Leopoldville to take the loyalty oath; and 3) assure the safety of the Katangan parliamentarians coming to Leopoldville.

Tshombe was asked to: 1) upon receipt of assurances from Adoula or UNOC, send gendarmerie officers to Leopoldville to take the loyalty oath; 2) announce immediate steps to implement revenue, financial, and currency provisions of the plan; 3) permit GOC customs and immigration officials to begin their work; 4) allow free UN movement in Katanga; 5) cooperate with UNOC in the elimination of mercenaries from the gendarmerie.

Although Adoula completely accepted this proposal, Tshombe responded with counterdemands on the UN (see item 13 November 1962).

Ambassador Gullion commented to the Department of State upon the recent military judgments of UN Headquarters officials (see items 6, 7 and 9 November 1962). The entire US Country Team, Gullion related, agreed with the UN that Jadotville and probably Kolwezi would have to be taken if Katanga began hostilities; but the ability of the UN to capture and hold these key points was not as unquestioned as UN Headquarters seemed to assume.

USARMA Leopoldville doubted that UNOC could, with its present equipment, achieve its objectives in Katanga while at the same time keeping open its lines of communication. Until UNOC was equipped with armored cars that

In assessing the reply for the benefit of USUN, Bunche said that although the letter did contain qualified agreement on several points, it was replete with legalisms and evasions and could not be considered an acceptance of Gardiner's appeal.

Colonel Greene (ISA) discussed the Greene Team Report (see item 23 July 1962) with Major General Mobutu, and presented the Congolese leader with the list of actions that the GOC should take to implement the plan (see item 25 October 1962). Mobutu reacted with general satisfaction to the list of actions recommended for the GOC, but he argued that the strength proposed for the ANC by the Greene Team Report--15,000--was too low by 5,000; both politically and militarily, the GOC could not afford so small an army under present circumstances. Mobutu agreed, however, to participation by more than one nation in the training force and, more reluctantly, to UN supervision of the program. Mobutu promised to recommend to the GOC adoption of the general line of action proposed by the Report. Colonel Greene encouraged Mobutu to secure GOC approval, emphasizing that the Congolese had to initiate the request for assistance, and that no assistance would be forthcoming until a common program had been agreed upon by the various parties.

The Department of State summarized for USUN and other posts the progress the UN had made in obtaining additional aircraft for UNOC, as follows:

1. Indian Canberras. The five Canberras formerly in the Congo were in India for repairs. Because of the Sino-Indian dispute, their return was uncertain.
2. Ethiopian F-86s. The three F-86s withdrawn from the Congo (see item 25 October 1962) would be returned when overhaul was completed.
3. Swedish Saabs. The UN had requested more combat-configured Saabs; no reply had yet been received.
4. Greek F-86s. The UN had requested four; Greece had not replied.
5. Philippine F-86s. The Philippines had asked for more information on a UN request for planes.
6. Italian F-86s. The UN had requested planes and pilots; no reply had yet been received.

The Department said that the US had supported or would support the UN requests to each government except the Philippines, which the US did not wish to "press." The US also planned to inform the UN that F-86s might be available from Iran.

The UN also requested airlift of these items from the US, and of Bailey bridging equipment from the UK, to the Congo. In addition, the UN asked the US to undertake an internal airlift of UN vehicles from other points in the Congo to Elisabethville.

On 17 November, Ambassador Gullion told the Department of State that the UN's request reflected a new "positive attitude" toward the equipment needed by UNOC. He recommended that the US provide the equipment to the UN.

The State Department directed Ambassador Gullion to tell Adoula that the US was putting into motion a program of action designed to strengthen the GOC while bringing about the reintegration of Katanga in accordance with the UN plan. According to the State Department program, the US would issue a policy statement reaffirming its support of the GOC and the UN plan. Further, a letter would be sent to Tshombe urging him in strong terms to move forward in carrying out the plan (see item 28 November 1962).

With regard to military programs, the US intended to speed delivery of the supplies requested by the UN (see item 17 December 1962), and to announce the immediate provision of large cargo aircraft to be used by the UN for duty in the Congo (see item 29 November 1962). Moreover, the US planned to announce its intention of carrying out the provisions of the Greene Team Report, when the GOC formally requested such a program from the UN (see items 20 and 28 December 1962).

(Ambassador Gullion was already familiar with the elements of the State Department Plan since he had participated in its formulation during a trip to Washington. The Ambassador was awaiting receipt of the text of the plan so that he could help Adoula through a Parliamentary crisis (see item 28 November 1962). In fact, on the day after the program was dispatched from Washington but before he had received it, Gullion, feeling that he could delay no longer, informed Adoula of the outlines of the impending US program.)

The US Consul in Elisabethville gave Tshombe a letter from Under Secretary McGhee expressing disappointment that Tshombe had not taken more substantial steps since their meetings in October (see items 4 and 6 October 1962) to implement the U Thant plan. McGhee warned that the UN might soon be forced to take more positive action to end the secession and that Tshombe would have to act quickly if a peaceful solution were to be reached. He suggested that to demonstrate his adherence to the plan, Tshombe should immediately release blocked UN supplies, facilitate the payment of foreign exchange revenues and customs to the Central Government, close the Katangese Foreign Ministry and its overseas offices, cooperate with the Central Government immigrations and customs officials in Elisabethville, and send Katangese officers to Leopoldville to take the oath of allegiance. McGhee also urged Tshombe to stop Katangese air strikes against the Congo army in North Katanga.

Tshombe rejected McGhee's message and indicated that he was determined to maintain his position without compromise. He said that in the event that economic sanctions were imposed on Katanga "every bridge, every road, every plant in Katanga will go into the air."

U Thant agreed to a US-Belgian proposal that the UN embark upon certain steps preliminary to the "courses of action" called for under the UN plan (see item 20 August 1962). Under the US-Belgian course of action, which had evolved from consultations between McGhee and Spaak (see item 27 November 1962), Adoula would come to New York and confer with the UN and the various interested governments in an effort to arrive at a formula regarding the nature of the draft constitution, and at a division of revenues that would prove more acceptable to Tshombe than the current proposals. To induce Adoula to come, the Congolese leader would be informed that the UN intended to undertake a series of measures, such as beginning to equip and train one or two ANC battalions, designed to bolster his political position. In addition, an effort would be made to persuade the UMHK to pay taxes, duties and royalties to the Central Government, instead of to Katanga; if Tshombe opposed this move, the Secretary General would request the Belgian Government to undertake the "measures necessary to carry out this operation."

The newly agreed proposal also alluded to the eventual use, if necessary, of stronger economic pressures to secure Tshombe's cooperation in a final solution to the Congo problem.

In a message to USUN, the Department of State reviewed US actions with respect to the Congo. At this time the US was concentrating its efforts, the Department said, on obtaining UMHK participation in a plan that would lead to the UMHK paying its foreign exchange and revenues to the GOC. The US felt that this was the quickest way to bring about reintegration with a minimum risk of reprisals by the Katangese. The resultant transfer of funds would, moreover, have more immediate and practical benefit to the GOC, and constitute a more serious handicap to continued Katangan secession than a longer-range effort such as an embargo.

In this new emphasis on bringing the UMHK to terms, the US had not, the Department emphasized, abandoned its support of additional measures under the UN plan if they became necessary.

On the same day, in pursuance of the course of action outlined above, the Department instructed Ambassador MacArthur in Brussels to urge the Belgian Government to continue its efforts to persuade the UMHK to pay its taxes and other duties to the GOC instead of Katanga.

The UN requested the Belgian Government to exert pressure on the UMHK to transfer its payments from Katanga to the GOC. In addition the Secretary-General asked the governments of Portugal, South Africa, and UK to institute the measures necessary to prevent the shipment of Katangese copper ore through their territories and/or to exert their influence on Katanga's neighbors to prevent shipments through their territories.

Tshombe informed the UN that he had given conditional approval to a proposal for the payment of UMHK revenues to the GOC which had been presented to him by Belgian and UMHK officials. Tshombe agreed that Katanga would immediately inform the UMHK that it could begin paying the total sum of foreign exchange arising from exports to "an international body designated by the interested parties." The international body would, in turn, assure to Katanga 50 percent of the foreign exchange it received from the UMHK.

(On 18 December, Tshombe agreed to a UN request that he send delegates to Leopoldville to discuss the details of the payment plan.)

At a meeting of the CAC, the Secretary-General announced that he was going ahead with the implementation of the Thant Plan and was presently at the stage of calling upon several interested states (see item 11-12 December 1962) to give effect to the pressures envisaged in Phases I through IV of the "courses of action." U Thant said that although the UN intended to proceed peacefully with carrying out the measures called for under the plan, the UNOC was fully prepared to defend itself should Tshombe elect to oppose UN action by force. UN troops in the Congo had been alerted, U Thant said, and were prepared for any such eventuality.

The Secretary-General also circulated copies of a short draft letter that he indicated would be sent on the following day to all the UN member governments. The letter requested their support of the copper and cobalt embargo imposed by Adoula (see item 11 December 1962).

On learning of the draft letter that U Thant had distributed at the CAC meeting, US officials protested the decision to proceed with this step before the Belgian efforts to switch UMHK payments had been completed. Bunche, speaking for the UN, explained that the members were not satisfied with Tshombe's letter (see preceding item), which U Thant had also shown the Commission, and had favored the draft letter in support of the embargo. Bunche also pointed out that Tshombe had agreed to divide only foreign exchange, but not taxes, duties, and royalties. Moreover, since Adoula had already made public his letters to the 17 governments requesting their cooperation with his embargo, the Secretary-General had had no choice but to issue his letter of support.

In a message to Leopoldville, the Department of State summarized the progress made in securing the participation of other nations in the Greene Team program for training and reorganizing the ANC (see items 23 July 1962, et seq). According to the Department, Belgium had agreed, at least in principle, to the plan, as had the Canadians. In addition, Italy was willing to send a team of specialists to assist in the Air Force portion of the plan. The US, for its part, was preparing a possible bilateral aid agreement to provide equipment for the training program. The entire program, however, awaited a Congolese request to the UN for assistance (see item 20 December 1962).

In accordance with a recommendation from AID, concurred in by the Department of Defense, the President authorized the use of $4,000,000 for military assistance to the Congo "without regard to the requirements" of the Foreign Assistance Act [i.e., in the absence of a MDAP agreement with the recipient of the aid under the terms of the Act, but in an instance judged "important to the security of the US" by the President]. The purpose of the authorization was, according to AID, that the US "be prepared to furnish directly to the Republic of the Congo . . . defense articles on a grant basis" in the immediate future. This aid would be the US contribution to an international program by which Belgium and other Western countries would, with the support and cooperation of the UN, organize, re-equip, and retrain the ANC. The implementation of such a program would demonstrate US support of the Central Congolese Government, making it less likely to apply for assistance to governments "with radical tendencies," while making its Katang

In a message to the Department of State, the US Congo Country Team listed and evaluated the military forces in the Congo. Forces were listed as follows:

~~TOP SECRET~~

Ground Forces

UN in Katanga	12,000
ANC in Katanga	7,000
UN outside Katanga	6,000
ANC outside Katanga	15,000
Katanga Gendarmerie	18,000

Aircraft

UN combat	6 (plus any enroute)
Katanga combat	12 (10 Harvards)
UN transport	31 (plus 16 charter)
Katanga transport	3
UN helicopters	19
Katanga helicopters	2
UN light aviation	17
ANC	6 (Harvards)

After discussing the command structures, training morale, logistics, communications, and mobility of the opposing forces, the Country Team estimated the probable course of a new military confrontation in Katanga. Although the Katanga Air Force might win or at least contest aerial supremacy at the outset, the UN and ANC forces in Katanga should be able to defend themselves and in the end assert control of the province.

(C) Msg, Leopoldville to SecState, 1462, 19 Dec 62.

19 Dec 62
(No. 143)

In a message to all US diplomatic posts in Africa, the Secretary of State explained US policy in the Congo, for the US representatives' guidance in interpreting recent UN courses of action for their host governments. According to the Secretary, the US had not changed its policy objective, integration of the Congo on the basis of the U Thant Plan; it had simply recognized that present conditions in the Congo required more vigorous methods for attaining its objective. The UN's financial problems, the possibility that India would withdraw its large contingent from UNOC, the increasing weakness of the Adoula regime, the resurgence of left-wing strength in the Congo, and the renewed activity of the Soviets in the Congo--all these factors had combined to convince the US that an immediate end to the Katanga secession was an "urgent necessity." Thus, recent US moves to provide additional equipment to the UN and to send a military survey mission to the Congo should be viewed as actions that showed firm US support for the UN. In none of these moves was there any US intent to dominate areas in Africa like the African nations, the US wanted only an integral sovereign and independent Congo, as envisioned by the U Thant Plan, with Katanga as a productive part.

(No. 145)

President Kennedy, Prime Minister Macmillan, and their respective advisers discussed the Congo at some length during a meeting at Nassau. US policy, including the rationale for the Truman Mission, was explained to the Prime Minister and his advisers, who continued, nevertheless, to manifest the same reservations toward US and UN plans that the UK had held during the formulation of those plans: viz., that the UK opposed the concept of sanctions generally, and would not participate in them. The UK continued to feel that the imposition of sanctions would result only in the US occupying Katanga; and that the UN should abandon its military role in the Congo and provide only economic and technical assistance. The UN should not, in the UK view, "get involved in imposing a political pattern on a particular country."

The US had only hoped to obtain British acquiescence in the stronger measures that the US, UN, and Belgium might feel compelled to take pursuant to the Thant Plan. This limited objective the US evidently achieved, since at the end of the Nassau talks, on 21 December, the President and Prime Minister agreed, in the words of their communique, to continue their efforts toward an "equitable integration" of the Congo.

Under Secretary General Bunche told Ambassador Yost in New York that, before the end of the month, the UN would assist the GOC in establishing customs and immigration offices in Elisabethville. Simultaneously, without waiting for further build-up, the UN would also begin to exercise its right to freedom of movement in Elisabethville in this was included, Bunche made clear, the removal of Katangan roadblocks.

On the following day, Ambassador Stevenson told the Department of State that in view of this UN attitude, the US needed to decide quickly what steps it thought necessary to end the secession and then attempt to "concert" these steps with the UN. The US could suggest, for instance, that the UN merely interrupt train movements within Elisabethville, rather than immediately attempting to exercise its rights to freedom of movement. Then, if necessary, the exercise of the right of freedom of movement in Elisabethville would be a second step, to be followed if necessary by exercise of the same right throughout Katanga. While urging the UN to adopt these or similar more gradual measures, the US should also advocate delaying the first steps until 15 January, by which time more UN equipment and aircraft would have arrived.

21 Dec 62
(No. 150)

The Department of State informed USUN that the US had concluded that U Thant was unlikely for the time being to accept a direct US military involvement in the Congo, if only because the USSR was "in the wings" offering military assistance to the UN (see item 19 December 1962). Belgian Foreign Minister Spaak, moreover, was anxious that the US defer any final decision on military involvement while he continued to attempt persuading the UMHK to send a representative to Leopoldville for revenue discussions. USUN was instructed, therefore, to inform U Thant that, in deference to his views, the US would "defer decision" regarding participation of a US air squadron in the Congo (see items 11, 15, and 17 December 1962). At the same time, U Thant should be told that the US had not abandoned the idea, but was keeping the situation under constant review.

Even in making this approach, however, USUN should also, the Department continued, express "deep concern" that the UN appeared to have abandoned its efforts at conciliation in the Congo. USUN was to emphasize that the UN military build-up in which the US was cooperating was meant, in the US view, to bring about a peaceful reintegration of Katanga. The US was, in fact, studying appropriate means by which the US and UN could "restart negotiations" while the military build-up was in progress.

On the 22nd, Ambassador Yost communicated the gist of the US plea for new UN conciliatory moves to Bunche, who rejoined that the UN was already pursuing, and would in the future, pursue the path of conciliation to the greatest extent possible.

Yost did not at this time give the formal US deferral to U Thant's views on US military participation. Later in the day, however, the US position was made

At the request of the Secretary of State and with the specific approval of the President, USUN offered the UN the following US military assistance: 1) provision of the ten aircraft requested by U Thant, if the UN would accept F-84s in lieu of F-86s; 2) transportation of Bailey bridging equipment from Leopoldville to Elisabethville; 3) airlift of the 30 trucks requested by the UN to the Congo, beginning in one week; 4) provision, on a continuing basis, of three transport and one tanker aircraft for UN internal transport and support on the Congo; and 5) substitution of armored personnel carriers for the armored cars U Thant had requested (see item 15 December 1962).

Under Secretary-General Bunche, acting in U Thant's absence, made "definite decisions" in favor of each US suggestion, except for the substitution of F-84s for F-86s; in this case, because the only qualified crews for F-84s were from NATO nations, Bunche felt obliged to refer the matter to U Thant (see item 29 December 1962).

(No. 152)

USUN advised Under Secretary-General Bunche of the method favored by the US for the UN's dealing with hostile acts by the Katangan Air Force (KAF). Because of the small number of UNOC aircraft and the volume of air space over Katanga, the US thought that the best method for halting KAF attacks would be to strafe its aircraft on the ground. Before undertaking such an operation, however, UNOC should, the US thought, have adequate justification and have given advance notification of its intention to attack. By "adequate justification," the US meant that the UN should establish "clearly" whether Katangan planes had in fact committed any alleged hostile acts. In giving "advance notification," the UN should make public the exact rules of engagement it would observe, so that no one could "misunderstand" its meaning.

In an already-tense Elisabethville, Katangese troops fired on a UN helicopter, forcing it to crash-land and killing one of its passengers, an Indian officer. Beside this dramatic event there was sporadic rifle fire in and around the city all during the day. Each side blamed the other for the outbreak, which closed business houses and cleared the streets of the town.

Meanwhile, in Leopoldville, in an attempt to strengthen the shaky position of the Adoula regime, President Kasavubu recessed Parliament until 15 March 1963 and thereby dispelled the hopes of a Tshombist-leftist coalition for toppling the Adoula regime with a vote of "no confidence."

Dec 62
(No. 155)

The final impetus to the fall of Tshombe's Katangan regime was provided, not by him or by the UN or by the GOC, but by Katangan gendarmes who, momentarily unresponsive to Tshombe's commands, finally offered adequate provocation to the heretofore restrained UNOC forces in Katanga.

Late on 27 December, after several days of intermittent small-arms firing, these Katangan gendarmes began to direct mortar and machine gun fire at UN troops in Elisabethville. Within a few hours, UN officials contacted Tshombe, who acknowledged that his forces were indeed firing upon the UN troops and promised to try to arrange a cease-fire at daybreak. The Katangan leader was not able, however, to order or persuade his troops to cease firing, and he asked for further talks with UN officials. He was duly received on the morning of the 28th by Mathu, UN civilian chief in Elisabethville, and General Prem Chand, the local UN military leader. The UN officials did not negotiate with Tshombe, but rather told him that he would have to agree in writing to remove Katangan roadblocks in the Elisabethville area and withdraw his forces to areas designated by the UN. Tshombe refused to sign a statement to this effect, claiming that he was not "Mathu's slave" and that he needed to consult with his advisers. Faced with this refusal, the UN officials informed Tshombe that he could return to his residence but must remain there. At the same time, 1500 hours on the 28th, the UN gave the order for its forces to advance upon the Katanga roadblocks.

Tshombe returned to his residence, from whence, in a few hours, he sought the advice of the US Consul. The US official told Tshombe that the "entire UN organization" would undoubtedly stand behind the decision not to permit any more Katangan roadblocks in the Elisabethville area; the Consul advised Tshombe, therefore, to sign the UN draft statement.

Tshombe did not, however, heed the Consul's advice. Later in the evening of the 28th, he escaped to Rhodesia. (See item 30 December 1962.)

(No. 156)

The State Department was "gratified" by the effective manner in which the UNOC forces in Elisabethville were able to defend themselves without suffering or inflicting heavy casualties (see item 27-28 December 1962). The Department thought that the action of the gendarmes in opening hostilities had given the GOC and the UNOC a unique opportunity to take "psychological action" to advance the unification of the Congo. The Department suggested that the UNOC-GOC "political psychological initiative" include, for example, public statements by the GOC that it did not seek unconditional surrender and would welcome the Katangan gendarmerie into the Congo Army. GOC officials might also offer to supply the residents of Elisabethville with food and to facilitate the exchange of Katangan for Congolese currency.

28 Dec 62
(No. 157)

The UN acceded to the formal Congolese request that the UN assist in the reorganization of the ANC (see item 20 December 1962). In advising the US of this action, UN officials explained that the UN accepted "in toto" the proposals put forward by the GOC (see item 25, 26 October 1962, in which the US recommended these proposals to the GOC).

The UN officials said that the UN, in carrying out the proposals, could not associate itself with any formal US-Congo bilateral military assistance agreement. The UN intended, rather, to prepare its own plan (i.e., a UN version of the Greene Plan). The GOC would then be asked to agree to this plan and to submit requests for participation by specific countries. In this way, the UN hoped to forestall requests to participate from the Soviet bloc and from Israel, whose participation, it was feared, would anger the Arab states. The UN officials indicated, however, that they would have no objection to the US including, in its response to UN requests for participation, a demand for assurances from the Congo that would be, in effect, a normal military assistance agreement.

30 Dec 62
(No. 159)

Acting under instructions, Ambassador Stevenson called upon Under Secretary Bunche in order to ascertain UN military intentions, now that Elisabethville had been secured (see item 27-28 December 1962), and to urge the UN to make a prompt public statement on the Congo.

Since the beginning of the fighting in Katanga, the US had been trying to get a clear picture of the intended scope of UN operations. UN headquarters in New York had told the US that the military operation would comprise only Phase I of UNOC's military contingency plan (see items 18 August and 31 December 1962), but reports had come from the field and from the UN itself that UNOC troops were already carrying on some operations unknown to UN headquarters, such as entering Kipushi and occupying Kamina, and were authorized others including an advance upon Jadotville. The US therefore remained uncertain of the actual nature of proposed UN moves, and unable to decide whether or not to supply fighter aircraft to the UN (see item 29 December 1962), and at what speed other equipment should be sent. For these reasons, Stevenson pressed Bunche for a description of the UN's intentions, but he received only assurances that UN operations were in effect completed for the moment and that immediate marches upon Jadotville and Kolwezi were not at present anticipated.

In suggesting to Bunche that the UN should issue a public statement, Stevenson reflected the US concern that the UN could not prosecute a military operation for which much of world opinion was unprepared, unless it gave a rather explicit statement of what its political objectives were. Stevenson handed Bunche a proposed statement which would, the US believed, by stressing the UN's primary commitment to reconciliation in the Congo, put the UN action in perspective and within a political framework acceptable to a broad majority of the members of the United Nations. (See item 31 December 1962.)

30 Dec 62
(No. 160)

Besides instructing Stevenson to urge the UN to state publicly its aims in Katanga (see preceding item and item 31 December 1962), the Department of State also suggested that he discuss with U Thant a UN attempt to secure Tshombe's cooperation in immediate practical steps toward reintegration. The Department had in mind a contact through the UK, suggesting that Tshombe and his principal assistants return to Elisabethville.

This proposed course of action was strongly opposed by Ambassador Gullion who offered his comments to the Department on the following day. Gullion saw no justification for bringing Tshombe back, and thereby assuring his continued leadership in Katanga. Such a move seemed to Gullion to presume unwarrantedly that Tshombe's continued leadership would be beneficial to US and UN objectives in the Congo. Moreover, bringing Tshombe back under UN auspices would surely anger the GOC and would devastate UNOC morale.

There is no evidence that Stevenson discussed this specific US proposal with U Thant. At any rate, the UK had already begun its own efforts to persuade Tshombe to return and to urge a negotiated integration. Nevertheless, Gullion's fears never materialized. The UN did not give its support to the UK initiative; rather, it coolly maintained an attitude of "no objection to the return of Tshombe," but of insistence upon action rather than negotiation. Consequently, in early January, when Tshombe did return to Elisabethville and a position of some influence, the GOC vented its anger on the UK, but not on the UN or, as Gullion had feared, the US.

The UN forces in Elisabethville completed their reduction of the Katangan roadblocks, with little blood having been shed on either side.

On the same day, the UN moved against Katangan forces in other parts of the province. Both Kipushi and Kamina towns were captured by UN forces; and UN airstrikes against Kolwezi airfield, begun the previous day, succeeded in effectively neutralizing the Katangan air force.

(On 3 January, the final UN action against the Katangese took place when an Indian battalion occupied Jadotville. Tshombe's mercenaries and some gendarmes remained clustered at Kolwezi for yet another three weeks, but this city was finally entered peacefully by the UN on 21 January.)

In a circular message to various posts, the Department of State summarized the status of UN and US efforts to strengthen the UNOC air arm with F-86s (see item 14 November 1962). It was now settled, the Department relates that from among the nations asked to participate, Iran, Italy, and the Philippines would send a total of fifteen aircraft during the next few weeks. Italy, however, would not provide pilots for its aircraft; Ethiopia, it was hoped, would send pilots for these craft.

(No. 163)

Lt. General Truman submitted to the JCS the final report of the Congo Military Mission. The report covered each of the purposes set for the mission by CJCS (see item 19 December 1962), as follows:

1. Equipment Requirements. In order to confront Tshombe with "overwhelming [UN] air superiority," and thus possibly force him to terms, the US should, upon UN request, provide: a) 10 F-84 aircraft for UNOC use; b) assistance in the delivery and support of 14 other fighters from the Philippines, Iran, and Italy (see preceding item); and c) POL facilities for 60 jet fighter sorties per day. In addition, the US should provide the trucks and APCs requested by the UN, three C-124s for intra-Congo airlift, mine detection and mine breaching equipment, six helicopters, various lesser support items and a minimum number of US personnel for temporary technical assistance. (The ground transport and C-124s had already been offered by the US and accepted by the UN; see items 17 and 22 December 1962.)

3. Evaluation of UNOC and Congolese Operation Plans. The present UN military plans in the Congo were sound and could be carried out by the present UN force if the requested equipment (see 1. above and items 15, 17, and 22 December 1962) was made available. The UNOC plan had as its objectives Elisabethville, Kipushi, and Jadotville. For its tasks, it would employ 7 battalions of UN troops (not in coordination with the ANC) in three phases: 1) An Emergency Phase, during which Katangan roadblocks in and around Elisabethville would be reduced 2) Phase I, including enlargement of the Elisabethville perimeter, neutralization of the communes adjacent to Elisabethville, and advance to the outskirts of Kipushi; and 3) Phase II, capture of Kipushi and advance to Jadotville, with simultaneous action by the UN forces at Kamina Air Base to secure Kamina town. Prior to the initiation of operations, UNOC planned to direct Tshombe to ground the Katangan Air Force and halt certain train movements. If he did not comply, the UN aircraft would destroy the KAF and interdict the rail lines. Congolese army plans were not written, as far as the Mission could discover, but General Mobutu's ideas, as described in conversations, were ambitious and over-optimistic. The ANC was actually capable only of very limited operations

4. Longer-Range Probabilities.

- a. The UN forces would be inadequate to the UN task when and if the Indian contingent was withdrawn.
- b. There would be no "expanding requirement" for US forces in the Congo if the present UN force, given adequate equipment, carried out its responsibilities, and if the Katangese did not receive "outside reinforcement."
- c. The Congo situation was not likely to degenerate into protracted guerrilla warfare.
- d. The ANC's ability to maintain law and order in the absence of UN forces would depend upon future developments in Katanga, and upon the effectiveness of the proposed international training program for the ANC. The recommendations of the Greene Team Report (see items 23 July 1962 et seq.) should be implemented immediately by the US.

5. Evaluation of UNOC Terms of Reference, and of UNOC and ANC Leadership. The present terms of reference of UNOC could not be ascertained, since the only terms known to exist were clearly out of date. However, UNOC obviously considered itself authorized to use force: a) for self defense, b) to expel mercenaries, and c) to establish its freedom of movement, i.e., to protect its supplies and personnel wherever they may be. Nonetheless UNOC was in sore need of comprehensive terms of reference

UNOC officers, while not all impressive, were adequate to the UN's tasks. Among the ANC, only General Mobutu and one staff officer, Major Puati, counted for anything.

In forwarding the above report to the JCS, General Truman noted that UNOC had successfully executed the Emergency Phase and most of Phase I of its operation plan in the few days since the Truman Mission had returned. In view of these developments the Mission believed that the aircraft promised by the Philippines, Iran and Italy were sufficient for remaining UN tasks, if they arrived quickly; the US need not send the 10 F-84s, but should hold them ready for dispatch and continue searching for non-US crews. Otherwise, the Mission recommended, all other items of equipment should still be furnished to the UN immediately.

(The JCS had been briefed by General Truman on 28 December and had at that time given a "large measure" of approval to his mission's recommendations. On 7 January 1963, they informed the Secretary of Defense of their concurrence in the final report. They recommended that "such of the proposals of the Congo Military Mission as are requested by the United Nations should be implemented

(No. 164)

U Thant issued a lengthy public statement regarding the recent hostilities in Katanga (see item 27-30 December 1962). Under urging from the US (see item 30 December 1962) he issued a far more detailed statement than he had originally planned. In it, he reviewed the UN mandates to the Secretary-General and the recent happenings in Katanga, and set forth the actions the UN now expects of Tshombe, Adoula and other principals in the Congo problem.

After repeating the frequently expressed sentiment that the UN sought no victory and no surrender in the Congo, U Thant emphasized that he intended nonetheless to persevere in implementation of the Thant Plan. He hoped in fact, for a speedy implementation of its provisions for reconciliation. The various parties would be given "a fortnight or so" to achieve this implementation, after which time, if reconciliation had not resulted, "other measures would be weighed" by the UN. "The time has passed for long delays," U Thant said. "Only acts now can count."

As an immediate first step, U Thant suggested that representatives of the UMHK and the Bank of Katanga go to Leopoldville at the earliest possible date for discussions with the GOC and the Monetary Council. In addition, Tshombe should:

1. Send his senior military officers to Leopoldville at once, to take an oath of allegiance to the President of the Congo.
2. Assure full liberty of movement for UN personnel throughout Katanga.
3. Cooperate with the UN in devising a plan for the immediate elimination of mercenaries from Katanga.
4. Accept the customs and immigration activities of the GOC in Katanga.

Adoula, U Thant continued, should at the same time:

1. Secure from Parliament early action on a new constitution for the Congo.
2. Insure that the recently proclaimed amnesty (see item 26 November 1962) would be fairly and effectively applied throughout the Congo. Both parties, he emphasized, must halt all troop movements in Katanga while the new efforts at settlement were under way.

The Secretary-General believed that the end of the Katangan problem was now in sight. So too was "an early beginning" of the reduction of UN military strength and an increasing concentration on UN technical assistance. For the speedy achievement of these goals, U Thant asked the cooperation of all Congo leaders.

Summary Analysis of Significant Events in the Congo:
June - December 1962

The breakdown in negotiations between Tshombe and Adoula on 26 June (No. 1.)* caused the UN and the US and other interested nations to take a new look at Congo problems and policies. The UN soon made it clear that it would apply greater pressures upon Tshombe, if it could gather sufficient support from the UN membership. (Nos. 5, 7, 10, 12, 14, 15.) The US supported the UN stand and, after consultations with interested western allies, recommended to the UN a plan of action calculated to apply the requisite additional pressure. (No. 17.) In modified form, this plan became the UN "Plan for National Reconciliation" (the U Thant Plan), which served during the remainder of the crisis as the blueprint for UN actions in the Congo. (No. 25.) Late in August, with US and Western support, the UN presented appropriate portions of the U Thant Plan to Tshombe and Adoula for implementing but not, the UN emphasized, as a subject of new protracted negotiations. (Nos. 25, 27, 28, 31.) Adoula accepted the plan almost immediately (No. 25.) and Tshombe gave conditional approval. (Nos. 33, 34.) Soon, however, Tshombe began to insist that the plan formed merely a basis for further negotiation, particularly with respect to a new constitution for the Congo, rather than a guide to the actual reintegration of the country. (Nos. 33, 36, 46, 47, 50, 54.) For a time, the UN continued to exhort both Tshombe and Adoula to implement the U Thant Plan. (Nos. 37, 40, 41, 45.) But before the end of September the world body became convinced that Tshombe's insistence on negotiations amounted to a deliberate policy of obstructing the plan, and it began consequently to concentrate pressure on him. (Nos. 48, 53, 57.)

In October and November, under US pressure and mounting UN impatience, Tshombe began adopting a more compromising attitude. Although he continued to insist upon negotiations for a new constitution, he did offer a number of concessions to the Central Government. (Nos. 61, 69, 73, 104.) Adoula, however, was under increasing pressure from Leopoldville politicians to bring Tshombe down, and he did not feel able to make the further concessions, beyond those suggested by the UN plan, that Tshombe asked. (Nos. 56, 59, 67, 74, 75, 78, 101, 115.) Thus the reversal of position of the two men left the situation in the Congo no closer to solution than before.

The UN was inclined to back Adoula in his uncompromising attitude, since it was convinced that Tshombe had no real intention of cooperating in the U Thant Plan. Tshombe's concessions were interpreted by the UN as attempts to shift the blame for the Congo failure to the Central Government while continuing to stall in the hopes that Adoula would fall and the UN withdraw. Faced with this strategy, with the seemingly imminent collapse of the Adoula regime, with mounting financial difficulties of its own, and with the possible withdrawal of large contingents of UN troops, the UN began to seek an immediate showdown with Tshombe while it could still influence the course of events in the Congo. (Nos. 87, 88, 91, 96, 98, 100, 102, 104.)

*Numbers appearing in parentheses in the text refer to the appropriately numbered item or items of the chronology.

Because of the pressures of western and domestic opinion, the US felt that it could not back the uncompromising stand which Adoula had adopted. On the other hand the US could see no alternative to continuing to support the Adoula regime. Its solution to this seeming dilemma was a policy designed to: 1) strengthen Adoula's position in Leopoldville through increased aid programs and new assurances of support, so that he would feel politically secure enough to make the compromises necessary to meet Tshombe half way and thus reach a settlement; 2) restrain the UN from a premature aggressive course; and 3) put more pressure on Tshombe to push him toward a settlement. (Nos. 59, 63, 65, 70, 76, 77, 82, 84, 85, 92, 93, 95, 97, 99, 110, 112, 114.)

It seemed for a moment at the end of November that this US policy had succeeded. Adoula survived a parliamentary crisis, (No. 115.) and the UN gave assurances of its non-aggressive intent (No. 113.) and agreed to a further attempt at negotiations and nonviolent sanctions. (No. 117.) This success was illusory, however. Early in December, Adoula spurned the UN attempt at further negotiation and was dealt another setback by his restive parliament. (Nos. 118, 123.) In this circumstance, the UN gave up its latest attempt at conciliation and began to implement the progressive economic and political sanctions of Phases I through IV of the U Thant Plan. (Nos. 124, 125, 127, 128, 131, 149.) Tshombe's tardy agreement to the channeling of some UMHK taxes to the Central Government, a development which the US had urged, (Nos. 120, 130.) did not deflect the UN from this course.

From the end of GOC-Katanga negotiations in June to the failure of conciliation in December, tensions within the Congo had been slowly rising as hopes for a negotiated settlement waned. Throughout this period, Katangese skirmished with both the UN and GOC, and all three parties made charges and countercharges of aggressive activities. (Nos. 8, 20, 32, 35, 42, 43, 51, 58, 66, 68.) Until December, however, the JCS and DOD were not called upon for any new judgements or evaluations of Congo affairs. The only new military program under consideration by the Defense Department during this time, one whose origins antedated the crisis, was a military advisory and assistance program for the Congo, recommended in the Greene Team Report of 23 July. The program was submitted to and approved in turn by the JCS, Defense, and State during the summer and early fall, and became joined with US policy toward the current Congo crisis only in late October when it was approved by the President as part of the aid with which the US hoped to buttress Adoula for further negotiations. (Nos. 11, 16, 19, 21, 26, 39, 44, 49, 64, 79, 83, 84, 97, 105, 132, 138, 146, 147, 157.) The only other action taken by the JCS with regard to the Congo during the summer and fall was to assure the Secretary of Defense that US contingency planning for the Congo would be adequate for any likely circumstance. (Nos. 55, 72, 108.) Without formal JCS approval and despite misgivings regarding UN intentions, the US began in October to assist the UN in correcting some of the obvious military shortcomings of UN forces in the Congo, on the supposition that the UN's increased military potential might make Tshombe more amenable to compromise. (Nos. 80, 81, 89, 103, 106, 107, 109, 110, 116, 162.)

Going into December, then, the UN had improved its military position in Katanga and was more determined than ever, after the latest abortive try at negotiations, to bring speedy unification to the Congo. For the US, this situation had an alarming aspect. After several months of rather close identification of US and UN policy, the UN now appeared to be pulling ahead of the US in its willingness to risk violence in ending the Katangan secession; and the world body, in contrast to the caution displayed by the US, exhibited a strikingly confident and independent attitude. The US had to take care in this circumstance that it not be excluded from any new UN activities and consequently from a share in the important decisions that would follow Katanga's collapse. Under these circumstances the US decided to support the UN policy and to build up UN military strength to the point where Tshombe would not dare offer armed resistance. The US also decided to use the new influence that would accrue from its support of the UN to counsel the UN against rash actions.

In the Defense Department, attention was first turned to the wisdom and the possible manner of direct US military involvement in UN Congo operations. The JCS addressed this question twice: the first time to say that direct US involvement should only be a last resort and should consist of a small Composite Air Strike Unit; the second time to affirm the existing consensus that UN and GOC forces should be able to defeat the Katangans, and to warn again against precipitate commitment of US combat forces. (Nos. 122, 126, 136, 142, 148.)

The first JCS recommendations were adopted by the Defense Department and recommended in turn to the Department of State. Subsequently, the Composite Air Strike Unit was offered to the UN, but the UN refused the US offer on the grounds that no great power should become directly involved in UN military operations in the Congo. The UN suggested that, instead of the strike unit, the US provide additional equipment and supporting personnel to UNOC. At first the US insisted that the Composite Air Strike Unit would be a better contribution, but eventually it acquiesced in the UN's desires and began to deliver additional equipment, as well as new advice on the conduct of operations. (Nos. 126, 134, 135, 137, 150, 151, 152.) Still not completely convinced of the UN's wisdom or efficiency, however, the US decided at the same time to send a military mission to the Congo. (Nos. 139, 141, 163.) Finally, to protect its flanks, the US also took pains to bring along Great Britain and to reassure the African states that it had no designs on any part of their continent. (Nos. 143, 145.)

In the midst of this intensive diplomatic activity, the Katangan secession ended in a manner apparently quite unrelated to the recent US initiatives. During the last week of December the Katangan gendarmes, temporarily unresponsive to Tshombe's commands, began to fire on UN positions in Elisabethville. The UNOC force, long steeled for such an attack, bolstered by a month-long build-up, and but loosely reined by UN headquarters, quickly moved out, reduced the gendarmes' Elisabethville positions, and broke Katangan resistance in all other important centers except Kolwezi. Tshombe, no longer able to influence either hostile party, fled to Rhodesia. (Nos. 144, 155, 161.)

The US applauded the UN action but, still apprehensive that carnage and destruction might eventuate, it tried almost immediately to divert the UN to a "psychological initiative" that would return Tshombe and dispense largesse to all. (Nos. 156, 159, 160.) Actually the Katanga collapse was more complete than the US realized at first. The UN had little to fear from Tshombe for the time being. It could proceed in its task of formally reunifying the Congo without any great opposition. (No. 164)

THE NEW YORK TIMES, Friday, November 30, 1962

TEXT OF THANT'S PLAN ON REUNITING KATANGA WITH THE CONGO

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y., Nov. 29--Following, as made public here today, is the text of the plan submitted in August by U Thant, Acting Secretary General, under which the United Nations is working to achieve the reconciliation of Katanga Province with the Congo:

1. Constitutional

Arrangements

The central Government will by September present and support in Parliament, until it is placed in effect, a draft constitution that will establish a Federal Government for the Congo. To this end, the central Government has requested the United Nations to make available to it the services of international experts in federal constitutional law.

The central Government calls attention to its communique of 29 July and invites all state governments and interested political groups in the Congo to submit to it their views on the dispositions to be made in this constitution. Their views, in so far as they are consistent with the federal character of this constitution, will be taken into account to the greatest extent possible.

Subject to such views as it may receive from the state governments and the interested political groups, the central Government will give the experts supplied by the United Nations the necessary instructions for the final preparation, by September, of a draft constitution containing the following division of powers between the central Government and the states:

A. The powers listed below will be reserved exclusively to the central Government:

- (a) Foreign affairs.
- (b) National defense (other than local police functions.)
- (c) Customs.
- (d) Currency, exchange control, and fiscal policy.
- (e) Interstate and foreign commerce.
- (f) Taxing powers sufficient for central Government needs.
- (g) Nationality and immigration.
- (h) Post and telecommunications.

B. The state governments will of course have control over their own administration and will be given all powers not expressly reserved to the central Government, including local police powers as well as taxing powers sufficient to meet the costs of local government activities.

2. Revenues and Foreign Exchange

The central Government will prepare, with the assistance of experts supplied by the United Nations, and will present and support in Parliament a draft financial law which will determine arrangements for the division of revenues between the central and state governments and regulations and procedures for the utilization of foreign exchange.

All state governments and interested political groups will be invited to submit their views on the laws to be proposed. In drafting these laws the commission will take into account the views expressed by state governments and interested political groups, the economic and financial needs of the several states, and the division of powers to be established by the new Federal constitution as set forth above, which will particularly affect the future financial needs of each state and of the central Government.

The financial arrangements should so far as possible secure to the individual states the maximum of the revenues generated within their area and give the central Government as well as the state governments their own sources of taxation. With regard to the utilization of foreign exchange, the arrangements should take into account the essential needs of each state, in particular those connected with the operations of industries which generate foreign exchange earnings.

The central Government will commit itself to supporting in Parliament such legislation as may be needed to implement these definitive arrangements. Until the definitive arrangements have been implemented, the central Government and Katanga agree (a) to share equally the revenue from all taxes and duties on exports and imports and from all royalties from mining concessions in accordance with the division proposed at the round-table conference held at Brussels in 1960; and (b) to pay all foreign exchange earned by any part of the Congo to the Monetary Council or to an institution designated by it which is acceptable to the parties concerned. The Monetary Council will control utilization of all foreign exchange and make available for essential needs of Katanga at least 50 per cent of the foreign exchange generated in that state.

3. Currency

The Central Government will invite the United Nations to request the International Monetary Fund to instruct its experts to work out a phased plan for currency unification. The unification will take effect in all parts of the Congo 10 days after it is approved by the Central Government

4. Military Arrangements

The commanders of all military, paramilitary or gendarmerie units who have not already done so will take the usual oath of allegiance to the President of the Republic. A commission composed of one representative from the Central Government and one representative from the state government of Katanga, with the assistance of the experts supplied by the United Nations, will develop within 30 days a plan for the rapid integration and unification of all military, paramilitary or gendarmerie units into a national armed forces and gendarmerie structure. This plan will be implemented within the ensuing 60 days. All central, state and local authorities will insure complete freedom of movement throughout the territory of the Congo for the aforesaid military commission and for the United Nations experts assisting it.

5. Foreign Affairs

Since the conduct of foreign affairs is reserved to the central Government there will be no need for any state authority to maintain abroad any official in charge of foreign affairs or any diplomatic or consular mission. States desiring to maintain other type of representation abroad may do so with the concurrence of the central Government.

6. Amnesty

Consistently with the settlement of differences effected by this agreement, the central Government will immediately decree, and if necessary present and support in Parliament legislation declaring a general amnesty.

7. Cooperation With the United Nations

All central, state and local authorities will co-operate fully with O.N.U.C. (United Nations Operation in the Congo) in the application and execution of United Nations resolutions.

8. Reconstitution of the Central Government

The central Government will be reconstituted so as to provide equitable representation for all political and provincial groups. Prime Minister Adoula will restate his offer to fill (blank) ministries with members of the Conakat party; in addition he will announce that these will be the ministries of (blank).

COURSE OF ACTION

The representative of the Acting Secretary General will adhere to the following course of action and will receive an assurance that governments are prepared to take the actions mentioned below in order to support the adoption of the proposal for national reconciliation and to achieve the reintegration of Katanga.

PHASE I

A. The proposal for national reconciliation and the course of action set forth in this memorandum will be presented immediately to the Acting Secretary General of the United Nations.

B. If this proposal for the course of action is approved by the Acting Secretary General, the governments' final agreement to presentation of these texts will be conveyed by their ambassadors at Leopoldville to the representative of the Acting Secretary General, who will then present them to Prime Minister Adoula.

At the same time he will outline orally, in general terms, the course of action. Prime Minister Adoula will be urged to accept the proposal and to carry out immediately all actions by the central Government called for in the proposal. If the proposal is accepted by Prime Minister Adoula, it will be presented to the Katanga authorities by the representative of the Acting Secretary General.

C. The Katanga authorities will be requested to indicate their agreement to these proposals within ten days after they are presented to them. The proposals will be explained to the Katanga authorities in detail and their attention will be called to the fact that, if accepted by the Katanga authorities, the United Nations and governments will use all means available to them to insure that the proposal is fairly carried out.

The representative of the Acting Secretary General will explain to the Katanga authorities that the United Nations resolutions give the United Nations a right to free movement of its military force throughout the territory of the Congo. The Katanga authorities will be informed that the United Nations will exercise its right to freedom of movement should a need for it arise.

For the time being the United Nations has no intention of establishing new garrisons in Katanga Governments, in their contact with the Katanga authorities, will support the position thus taken by the representative of the Acting Secretary General.

D. Contemporaneously with the actions called for in paragraph C above, Prime Minister Adoula will be urged to enact or decree legislation (if it does not already exist) regulating exports and imports to and from the Congo and, in particular, forbidding exportation or importation from or to the Congo of any goods not authorized by the central Government at Leopoldville.

E. As soon as the Acting Secretary General has indicated his approval of the course of action set forth in this memorandum, the following measures will be carried out in rapid succession:

(1) Governments will issue public statements indicating their support of the central Government of the Congo and making clear their determination to see an early end to Katanga's secession. These statements will also express these Governments' approval of Prime Minister Adoula's recently announced intention to submit a draft Federal Constitution to Parliament by September. The Governments will consult with each other and with the Acting Secretary General on the text, tactics and timing of these statements.

(2) The Government of the Congo will enter into negotiations with the Belgian Government to obtain its assistance in establishing arrangements for the collection in Belgium of duties on all goods exported from Belgium to the Congo (including Katanga).

(3) In making reconnaissance flights over South Katanga, O.N.U.C. will avoid very low-level flights that might frighten the local population.

(4) The United States will, through the United Nations, immediately consider giving the Government of the Congo a small impact shipment of military equipment.

(5) The United Nations will promptly afford all possible assistance to the central Government in an urgent modernization program for the Congolese Army.

(6) As soon as there is agreement on controls over utilization of foreign exchange to be established by the Government of the Congo, the United States will make additional aid available to that Government and Belgium and other states are considering similar action.

(7) The Government of the Congo will ask the governments of neighboring countries to cooperate with it in establishing arms control and antismuggling measures.

(8) In accordance with the Security Council's resolutions, the United Nations will again urge all member states to take the necessary steps to prevent all movements to the Congo, which are not authorized by the national governments, of mercenaries, arms, war materiel, or any kind of equipment capable of military use. Government will engage in diplomatic efforts to support such action.

(9) The Government of the Congo will invite representatives of the Union Minière du Haut-Katanga to enter into discussions on matters of mutual interest, including the future attitude of the Government of the Congo toward the activities of U.M.H.K. (the company).

(10) The United Nations will invite the Belgian Government and U.M.H.K. to discuss with it the problem of protecting Belgian nationals and Union Minière installations in Katanga.

(11) At the request of the Government of the Congo, governments will, to the fullest extent possible, refuse to grant visas to Katangese or to permit their entry if they are carrying travel documents other than Congolese passports. Similarly, governments will indicate publicly their acceptance of the request of the Government of the Congo and will urge holders of their own passports to seek and receive the necessary authorization from the Government of the Congo before traveling to Katanga.

Governments will urge the Government of the Congo to make convenient arrangements for the issue of passports to all Congolese nationals desiring to travel for purposes which are consistent with the plan of national reconciliation.

PHASE II

During the 10 days immediately following the presentation of the plan of national reconciliation to the Katanga authorities, the following actions will be taken:

(1) Governments will solemnly urge the Katanga authorities to accept that proposal. They will advise the Katanga authorities that the governments consider it a reasonable one. Governments will also urge other governments and private companies and individuals to support their efforts to gain acceptance by Katanga.

If the Katanga authorities indicate that they will refuse or delay, the governments will advise them that, if the proposal is not accepted within 10 days, the governments will, if so requested by the Government of the Congo, take all measures available to them to comply with the central Government's laws and regulations on exports on copper and cobalt from Katanga.

The Katanga authorities will also be told that if, in spite of that boycott, Katanga's secession continues, more stringent measures will inevitably be applied. These might include the withdrawal of Belgian technicians, the suspension of postal and telecommunications services, the cessation of all air traffic in and out of Elisabethville and a blockade of Katangese exports and imports by the establishment of road blocks on the railway lines leading to Katanga. Governments will consult with each other and with the United Nations on the timing and tactics to be used in making their approaches to the Katanga authorities.

(2) In connection with the action called for in paragraph E (10) of Phase I, U.M.H.K. will urge the Katanga authorities to accept the plan of national reconciliation.

PHASE III

If the Katanga authorities should fail to accept the plan of reconciliation within the stated period of time, the following actions will be taken (subject to the review and further consultation in the light of the circumstances existing at that time).

(1) The Government of the Congo will request all interested governments to refuse to permit the importation into their territory of copper and cobalt exports from Katanga which are not authorized by the central Government at Leopoldville.

(2) Governments will take such actions as are available to them to comply with this request and to assist in achieving the intended results.

PHASE IV

If the measures prescribed for Phase III do not induce the Katanga authorities to accept the plan of national reconciliation, governments will consult with each other and with the United Nations on other measures that could be then taken in light of the circumstances existing at that time.

AFRICA SOUTH OF THE SAHARA--GENERAL

Origin	Date	JCS Position
On 31 Dec 59, NSC 5920, a draft statement of US policy toward South, Central, and East Africa was circulated among NSC members for consideration. The draft statement saw the primary importance of South, Central, and East Africa as "its emerging political significance" and as an area that could have "an increasingly important influence on the course of world events." The principal problem affecting US interests was development of the dependent territories of the area in an orderly manner, preserving ties with Western Europe and limiting communist influence and penetration. (S) NSC 5920, 31 Dec 59, JMF 9110/9105 (31 Dec 59).	8 Jan 60	The JCS reviewed the draft policy statement and informed SecDef that they found it acceptable. With regard to the one divergency in the statement on general objectives, the JCS supported the majority view. (S) JCSM-15-60 to SecDef, 8 Jan 60 (JCS 2121/58), same file. Subsequently, on 14 Jan 60, the NSC adopted the statement of policy on South, Central, and East Africa and the President approved it on 19 Jan 60. The approved policy was circulated as NSC 6001, 19 Jan 60. (S) NSC 6001, 19 Jan 60, JMF 9110/9105 (19 Jan 60).
On 12 Jul 60, the Exec Secy, NSC circulated for comment a discussion paper entitled "National Security Implications of Future Developments Regarding Africa." (S) Exec Secy, NSC to CJCS, et al., 12 Jul 60 (JCS 2121/68), JMF 9110/9105 (12 Jul 60).	28 Jul 60

(S) Memo, Actg Exec Secy, NSC to CJCS, et al.,
16 Aug 60, JMF 9110/9105 (12 Jul 60).

On 11 Aug 60, the DJS informed the JCS that recent developments in the Republic of the Congo had illuminated the need for military attaches in the emerging African nations. This matter had been under discussion between the Services and Dept of State, but with only limited success. Of seven countries under consideration, attache representation was accepted by Dept of State in three (Ghana, Liberia, and Nigeria); partial representation was granted in a fourth (Republic of Congo); a fifth (Mali Federation) was still under consideration; and the other two (Guinea and Kenya) were deferred for six months. The DJS recommended that the JCS request SecDef to seek SecState support in fulfilling requirement for military attaches in the new African states.

11 Aug 60

The JCS informed SecDef that the examples of Guinea and the Republic of the Congo indicated what could happen in the new African republics if the US did not have adequate military representation in the early and formative periods of their independence. Accordingly, they requested SecDef to seek the personal support of SecState in fulfilling the present and anticipated requirements for military attaches in all African nations.

AFRICA SOUTH OF THE SAHARA--GENERAL

Origin	Date	JCS Position
On 6 Oct 60, SecDef requested the JCS to consider desirability and feasibility of establishing a specified command whose mission would be to develop and maintain contingency plans for military operations in Africa south of the Sahara. (C) Memo, SecDef to CJCS, 6 Oct 60 (JCS 2262/49), JMF 9111/9108 (8 Jul 60) sec 6.	29 Oct 60	The JCS could not agree on the establishment of a specified command for Africa south of the Sahara and forwarded their divergent views to SecDef. The CSA and CSAF favored establishment of a small specified command; CNO opposed such a command in favor of assignment of US military responsibility for the area to CINCLANT; and CMC thought that existing major commands were capable of absorbing increased responsibilities, with CINCLANT assigned responsibility for the area in question. The CJCS agreed with the CSA and CSAF. (TS) JCSM-491-60 to SecDef, 29 Oct 60; (TS) CM-19-60 to SecDef, 29 Oct 60; (JCS 2262/53), same file.
		On 21 Nov 60, SecDef assigned to CINCLANT responsibility for planning and operations for Africa south of the Sahara, including the island of Madagascar but excluding the general geographic areas of responsibilities of USCINCEUR and the Middle East Command as set forth in the UCP. There was to be established under CINCLANT a Joint Task Force to carry out this responsibility. (For further action, see item of 4 Jan 61.) (C) Memo, SecDef to CJCS, 21 Nov 60 (JCS 2262/56), same file, sec 7.
On 21 Nov 60, SecDef decided to assign responsibility for planning and operations for Africa south of the Sahara to CINCLANT and specified that CINCLANT should establish a small joint task force headquarters for that purpose under the command of an US Army LTG. (S) Memo, SecDef to CJCS, 21 Nov 60 (JCS 2262/56), JMF 9111/9108 (8 Jul 60) sec 7.	4 Jan 61	The JCS assigned CINCLANT responsibility for planning and operations in Africa south of the Sahara, including the island of Madagascar, but excluding those areas of Africa assigned to USCINCEUR and the Middle East Command in the UCP--Algeria, Libya, Morocco, Tunisia, and Egypt. 5 Jan 61

The JCS informed SecDef that the suggestion for "African Embassy Runs" as proposed by the Dep Asst to SecDef had many advantages, including prestige, flattering some new countries, and providing an added convenient service to US Embassies. They recommended that planning be initiated between DOD and Dept of State so that regular MATS flights could be inaugurated throughout Africa at an early date, eventually replacing the flights currently operating under the auspices of the UN. On that basis, the JCS had developed and submitted a plan for an African "Embassy Run" that would provide MATS service to twelve principal embassies on a weekly basis. The JCS believed that this plan was a realistic step toward full-scale MATS operations in Africa. CINCSTRIKE's new responsibility included the conduct of operations in the area defined as "Africa, including the island of Madagascar, and the Middle East . . . to the PACOM boundary, including Ceylon, but excluding the general area of responsibility of USEUCOM [Turkey and North Africa west of Egypt]." On 13 Aug 64, the CSA informed the JCS that the situation and outlook in Africa posed serious problems with important politico/military implications. The JCS approved a Joint Staff "Assessment of US Military Interests in Africa, South of the Sahara" for use in formulating plans and programs pertaining to US military interests in that area and forwarded the assessment to CINCLANT, USCINCEUR, CINCPAC, and USCINCREC. The assessment concluded that existing planning documents indicated relatively low levels of threat perception and military interest priorities in Sub-Saharan Africa. In order to protect overall US interests in the region, increased US military attention might be necessary to formulate an appropriate military deterrent or alternative action. The assessment recommended the following actions as appropriate: review of US military strategic and intelligence priorities in Sub-Saharan Africa to consider requirements for increased emphasis; consideration of a reorientation of unified command structure to provide the commander of a unified command with clear responsibility for concept and/or operational planning in the area; provision of the assessment to appropriate unified commanders; and determination concerning requirements to develop additional military concept and/or operational plans for the area.

They also considered it desirable to provide the modest recommended impact shipment of signal and artillery equipment. The JCS noted, however, the limited availability of signal equipment and recommended that the program not be delayed by equipment shortage. At the request of the President of Liberia for US security assistance, a US survey mission visited Liberia in Feb 1966 to examine threats to Liberia's security, the capability of Liberia's existing forces to meet such threats, and possible improvements in Liberia's security forces to counter security threats. On 17 May 65, Dep ASD(ISA) requested JCS comments on the report of this survey mission.

The JCS informed SecDef that there was an urgent need for the US to seize the initiative and create circumstances that would tend to forestall a Soviet decision to intervene in the Congo and, should the Soviets do so, create circumstances that would embarrass them and frustrate their aims. To forestall or impede introduction of Sino-Soviet Bloc military elements into the Congo, the JCS recommended US consideration of the following courses of action: recommend that the UN declare a blockade to preclude introduction of further non-UN sponsored military forces; foster general and especially UN objection to further introduction of non-UN sponsored military forces into the Congo; recommend a UN embargo on arms to the Congo; and encourage the UN to operate and administer immediately river and harbor facilities and pipelines in the lower Congo River using western technicians.

The JCS informed SecDef that unless immediate and strong action was taken soon there was the definite possibility that the entire Republic of the Congo would soon be under control of a communist dominated regime. The US should seek the establishment of law and order and an effective government, ultimately pro-Western and democratic. The US should urge the UN to take action as well as take certain unilateral actions. In the JCS opinion an overall US program should be developed. They recommended that SecDef seek governmental approval of these immediate and ultimate goals and implementation of specific actions by an interdepartmental task group.

The JCS concurred in a proposal for a strengthened mandate to the UN, but pointed out that it would be meaningless without adequate military force. On a broadly based Congolese government including all principal political elements in the Congo, the JCS considered that default to a coalition type of government was not in the best interests of the US. A strong central government headed by Kasavubu vigorously supported by the UN was considered to be the best chance of obtaining US objectives. The JCS concurred in the proposal for UN administration for the Congo, but only in the context of a strong centralized government headed by Kasavubu or a federated government that excluded the Lumumba faction. The necessary tactics must be developed, they said, for the fulfillment of this policy. The JCS concluded that the US was capable of military intervention in the Congo without degrading its general war posture to an unacceptable degree, but capability to conduct other similar operations elsewhere would be dependent on US commitment in the Congo. (S) JCSM-52-61 to SecDef, 31 Jan 61 (JCS 2262/73), same file. The same day ASD(ISA) furnished DOD comments on the new policy to Dept of State. The most serious factor aggravating these circumstances was the Gizenga (formerly Lumumba) regime at Stanleyville supported by Soviets, UAR, and "neutralist" Africa. Sudan was the most practical route for supply for this regime, and the Sudanese were under extreme pressure for transit rights. The JCS considered it essential that the Sudanese continue to resist these efforts. They suggested that the US provide the strongest possible diplomatic support and that the US consider an approach to Ethiopia, Sudan, Nigeria, Central African Republic, Chad, and Republic of Congo (Pr) on a joint declaration to prevent passage of military supplies through

The JCS reported that to airlift the entire brigade would require all theater airlift, except those necessary for hard core general war requirements, plus one additional MATS C-124 squadron from CONUS and would cost 8 to 10 million dollars. The JCS believed that an already planned combination of airlift and sealift costing 2 to 3 million dollars was the most practical and economical method. On 11 Dec 61, General Maxwell Taylor, Military Representative to the President, observed that the US was becoming increasingly involved in UN military operations in the Congo and would suffer the consequences of any military reverse of the UN forces there. Consequently, he asked the CJCS was knowledge was available to the US of the military plans of UN forces in the Congo and had any qualified US military officer reviewed those plans?

The JCS informed both SecDef and General Taylor that no UN or ONUC military plans, except those relating to US logistic support of the UN in the Congo, had been reviewed by US military officers either formally or informally. Further they considered that, until a US political decision was reached to become more actively engaged in the UN operations, the present practice of furnishing some counsel to UN officials and practical logistic support to the UN operation should not be altered. The JCS recommended that SecDef discuss this matter with SecState.

On 11 Jan 64, ASD(ISA) requested JCS views concerning modification of the MAP for the Congo, including training, which the US could undertake to assist the ANC in meeting the possible unstable situation which might exist in a relatively short period of time following the departure of the UN force in Jun 64. (S) Memo, ASD(ISA) to CJCS, 11 Jan 64 (JCS 2262/141), JMF 9111/4060 (11 Jan 64).	30 Jan 64	The JCS prepared and submitted a plan in conformance with the request. They concluded that given a political requirement to preserve a pro-Western regime in the Congo, the retraining of the ANC was an urgent military task, but action to enlarge the US role might prove counterproductive if it led either to a lessening of Belgian participation or to political difficulties for the current Congolese regime. Therefore, the JCS offered these additional views: (a) retraining should be undertaken by Belgians and Italians as planned; (b) diplomatic efforts should be intensified to persuade the Belgians and Italians to implement an effective training program before 1 Mar 64; (c) discreet efforts should be made to contribute to Israeli training efforts in the Congo; (d) the UN Secretary General should be urged to require the UN force to reduce lawlessness in the Congo and assist ANC in preparation for turnover; (e) US should not undertake direct operational training of ANC pending determination that it is demanded by US national interests.

On 18 Feb 65, CINCS TRIKE/USCINCMEAFSA informed the JCS of his concern over the apprehension held in "certain circles" over the possible use of napalm in the Congo by the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (GDRC). He pointed out that such apprehensions appeared to stem from undue sensitivity over the effect of the weapon, and that if the opposition continued, the US risked the denial to tactical air forces of one of their most effective weapons.

The JCS informed SecDef that they agreed with CINCS TRIKE/USCINCMEAFSA and considered restrictions on use of conventional air support weapons militarily unwise. They believed that use of napalm should be based upon military considerations and that sovereign governments should be permitted to use the best conventional weapons available to them in their defense. Accordingly, they recommended that the present policy restriction on the use of napalm by the GDRC be rescinded and that this matter be raised with Dept of State.

On 2 Sep 75, the Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, requested a review of list of equipment desired by the Government of Zaire and identification of items not contained in the Zaire MTAT (Rockwell) report (see item of 18 Apr 75) that would enhance the capabilities of Zairian forces. It was also suggested that an examination be conducted of an increase in ground transportation equipment and the addition of a light anti-tank weapon (LAW), or the substitution of LAW for the 106mm recoilless rifle.

(U) Memo, Dir DSAA to DJS, 2 Sep 75 (JCS 2262/177-3), JMF 829/495 (24 Mar 75) sec 2.

The JCS informed SecDef that 70 percent of the GOZ list of equipment was also listed in the MTAT report. Eighteen major items were in addition to the MTAT report, of which 90 percent were in the category of ground transportation or mobility equipment. The JCS made no attempt to justify these additions, but they indicated that enhanced capability could result. They found that the significant increase in ground mobility equipment and the addition of the M-72 LAW or its substitution for the 106mm recoilless rifle would enhance the overall capability of the forces structured in the Rockwell Report to counter the perceived threats to the security of the GOZ. In view of the fact that the Rockwell Report had not been presented to the GOZ, it was the JCS views that any US response to the GOZ concerning item from the GOZ list should recognize that a correlation was made between the items requested and the forces outlined in the Rockwell Report. Therefore, to be meaningful in assessing Zaire's military needs, the Rockwell Report should be available to the GOZ for comparison.

On 11 Nov 63, ASD(ISA) requested JCS judgment on the suitability and adequacy of topics proposed for US-UK talks on military problems of East Africa (Uganda, Kenya, Tanganyika and Zanzibar) together with background papers on those topics. (U) Memo, ASD(ISA) to CJCS, 11 Nov 63, JMF 9110/3100 (11 Nov 63).	7 Dec 63	The JCS found the suggested topics suitable and adequate. They furnished short background papers on assessment of the threat, indigenous force capabilities, and US military interests. The external threat was not considered to be great, but border incidents and communist subversion constituted sources of threats to internal security. To counter these threats, indigenous forces required improvement and continuing assistance from the free world. US military interests in East Africa were seen as deriving from US objectives of excluding communist influence in the area, insuring continued UK military assistance, and maintaining a favorable climate for US overflight and base rights. If UK assistance continued, US military interests should require only limited activities. If necessary, other Free World countries should be encouraged to fill voids in the UK assistance program. If these efforts failed, the US should be prepared to provide internal security support. The JCS warned reappraisal of US short and long range goals for that country and a reassessment of US current and programmed military assistance as well as other actions to fulfill those goals. On 29 May 64, CINCSTRIKE/USCINCMEAFSA submitted a suggested six-year military assistance plan for Ethiopia, and on 5 Jun 64, the US Ambassador to Ethiopia advised the JCS that increased MAP for Ethiopia was required along with a distinct US objective to create and support effective Ethiopian armed forces.

from the US Ambassador to Ethiopia and CINCSTRIKE/USCINCMEAFSA and discussions in Washington during period 1-5 Jun 64. As a result, the JCS concluded that a substantial and prompt increase in US political, economic, and military assistance to Ethiopia was justified by: the importance of Ethiopia to US interests; the recent deterioration in US-Ethiopian relations; and Sino-Soviet progress in efforts to influence and subvert East African countries. CINCSTRIKE/USCINCMEAFSA had proposed a six-year MAP for Ethiopia ranging from $18.24 million for FY 1965 to $12.02 million in FY 1970 with a MAAG manpower ceiling varying from 126 to 121 for the same period. The JCS recommended: (1) expedited review of the National Policy Paper for Ethiopia to include reflection of US interest in the development and security of Ethiopia; (2) approval of a separate, basic US national objective to organize, train, equip, and support a 40,000-man Ethiopian Army and minimum, but effective, Ethiopian air force and navy forces as rapidly as possible; (3) approval of the CINCSTRIKE/USCINCMEAFSA MAP proposals with increased Service and MAP manpower and dollar ceilings to support the proposals.

On 22 Oct 64, CINCSTRIKE/USCINCMEAFSA informed the JCS that the expected early delivery of MIG aircraft to Somalia would cause severe political reaction in friendly African countries and could pose very difficult military problems to the Imperial Ethiopian Government (IEG). Accordingly, he recommended: provision without delay of a Sidewinder capability for the F-86F aircraft then in the hands of the Ethiopian air force together with information on their effectiveness against MIG aircraft; programming of F-5 aircraft to permit delivery of eight in FY 1967 and four in FY 1968; and informing the IEG that in the event MIGs were provided Somalia and a threat existed against Ethiopia, the US would be prepared to come to Ethiopia's assistance if requested.

(C) Msg, CINCSTRIKE/USCINCMEAFSA to JCS, 22 Oct 64, JMF 9114 (22 Oct 64).

The JCS informed SecDef of the CINCSTRIKE/USCINCMEAFSA recommendations. They considered that prompt initiation of the six-year Military Assistance Plan recommended by CINCSTRIKE/USCINCMEAFSA (see item of 11 Jul 64) was essential to attainment of effective Ethiopian military forces and to protection of US interests. The JCS recommended support of this plan with necessary funds to allow prompt and orderly implementation. They also recommended: authorization for Chief MAAG to inform Ethiopian authorities that a minimum of six (and preferably eight) F-5s would be delivered in early CY 1966 and the remainder in CY 1967; Sidewinders not be provided for the Ethiopian F-86Fs; informing the IEG of the effectiveness of the F-86Fs versus the MIG-15/17; and a reassessment of possible courses if the Soviets introduced further weapons into the area.

overriding US and Free World security interest; there was no specific caveat to moderate implementation of the policies so as to avoid carrying them to the point of precipitating internal disintegration and anarchy in South Africa; guidance with respect to military purchases should be recast to identify clearly pertinent factors and avoid unnecessary restrictiveness; and the objective course of action seeking legalization of "native nationalist movements" appeared imprudent. On 6 Mar 64, Actg ASD(ISA) requested JCS review of the Dept of State National Policy Paper on South Africa. This draft paper proposed a new strategic approach to attain various US objectives, consisting of a joint demarche to the South African Government to reconsider and alter its course and to take steps to seek a modus vivendi acceptable to all races in South Africa, in exchange for promised advantages to its international political position.

8 Apr 64

The JCS concurred in the new strategic approach toward South Africa as proposed in the Dept of State paper, but did not agree with the apparent intent of abandoning, probably within a few months, the dialogue of persuasion in favor of selective and graduated pressures. They considered that US policy toward South Africa should be sufficiently flexible to permit pursuit of US diplomatic objectives in the international area and, at the same time, to safeguard military interests in the country. As long as racial discord and communist penetration in Africa remained active threats to Free World interests, the JCS believed that stability in South Africa was desirable under all

The JCS informed SecDef that the thrust of five provisions of NSAM 295 might lead the US to an inflexible position of attempting, without likelihood of success, to force South African compliance with external views in seeking precipitate solutions to South Africa's problem. The provisions were: (a) planning for alternate facilities if those in South Africa were evacuated; (b) negotiating agreements for alternate facilities; (c) suspending action on loans or investment guarantees; (d) analysis of sanctions possible if South Africa did not accept the decision of the ICJ; (e) postponement of any decision on sale of submarines to South Africa. The JCS considered such provisions counterproductive to US interests and reminiscent of tragic policies toward the Chiang Kai Shek and Batista governments. They reiterated their

The JCS expressed serious reservations concerning the shift in the draft from the previous broad approach to one concentrating on Southwest Africa. They considered that the "phase two" approach should be revised to reflect earlier JCS opinions (see item of 8 Apr 64). Further, the revised approach should be initiated before or along with a similar persuasive approach concerning Southwest Africa. They drew attention to the apparent use of NSAM 295 as a basis for authority to support a "new strategic approach." The JCS had had previously commented on NSAM 295 (see items of 7 Apr 64 and 22 May 64). They recommended that NSAM 295 be revised to reflect their previous views and revisions of the National Policy Paper based thereon. The JCS reiterated their views that the objectives of the US should include South Africa's alignment with the Western powers, continuance of existing deep space and tracking facilities in South Africa, and military sales for defense against external aggression. They also believed that the revision of NSAM 295 and the National Policy Paper should avoid the implication that the US would be prepared to support sanctions or the implication that US forces might be committed to enforce any Security Council resolution calling for the imposition of sanctions in connection with the problems either of South Africa or Southwest Africa.

On 29 Sep 64, ASD(ISA) notified the Dept of State that the DOD concurred in the proposed National Policy Paper subject to certain comments. He forwarded the JCS views to Dept of State, but he left the matter of a return to the broad approach to State decision. Pursuant to the National Policy Paper on South Africa (see item of 18 Aug 64), Dep ASD(ISA) requested that the JCS make an analysis of the feasibility of the use of US military forces, possibly as a part of the UN "peace-keeping" action, to enforce a decision of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) regarding South-West Africa or to enforce, by means of a blockade or otherwise, international economic sanctions against South Africa.

The JCS furnished the required analysis. In addition they advised that: there would be many unfavorable consequences resulting from the use of US military forces, even under a UN umbrella, against South Africa; the required diversion of major elements of US military power from essential defense tasks and commitments would result in serious reduction in US capabilities to deter and counter communist aggression; and US position clearly in opposition to sanctions and force and clearly in favor of nonviolent solutions should be adopted as the basis for US policy. They recommended that SecDef discuss the South African problem with the President and SecState, that they be advised of JCS views, and that the

Since unsettled conditions in the rest of Africa had increased the importance of South African facilities, the JCS continued to advocate a firm, patient, diplomatic dialogue with South Africa as the means offering the most potential for achieving US objectives (see items of 7 Apr and 14 Sep 64). (S) JCSM-44-66 to SecDef, 19 Jan 66 (JCS 2125/28-2), same file.
On 21 Feb 67, DepSecDef requested the JCS and others for an assessment of minimum DOD requirements for use of Republic of South Africa ports, yards, airfields, and real estate as well as an analysis of alternatives for meeting these requirements. (S) Memo, DepSecDef to CJCS et al., 21 Feb 67, (JCS 2121/205), JMF 855/470 (21 Feb 67).	5 Apr 67	The JCS informed SecDef that, although use of South African facilities was highly desirable, alternative solutions could be found for all current military requirements for facilities or contractual support in the Republic of South Africa. Such alternatives would, however, increase costs and result in less efficient use of available manpower, ship, and aircraft assets. The JCS also advised that: denial of airbase and overflight rights in South Africa would seriously complicate air operations in South African and adjacent areas; loss of South African facilities would reduce US capability to react to contingency situations in Africa south of the Sahara and in the Middle East and would degrade tracking and telemetry capability for space flights as well as DOD capability to support

On 13 Sep 67, the subject of US disengagement from South Africa was discussed at a NSC meeting. As a result, the Actg CJCS requested that this matter be addressed by the JCS.

The JCS requested that SecDef discuss the following points with SecState: the serious JCS concern with the continued drift of the US Government toward a policy of disengagement from South Africa; the more immediate importance of relaxing restrictions that then prohibited US Navy and MSTs ships from making operational and maintenance stops at South African ports; and the increasing difficulties in military intelligence collection activities caused by the current US policy toward South Africa.

On 19 Oct 67, DepSecDef forwarded the JCS views to USecState, noting the need for urgent completion of the current interagency review of US policy toward South Africa. On 15 Nov 67, USecState replied stating that he asked the Dept of State to move ahead as quickly as possible on a new regional National Policy Paper on Southern Africa that was designed to cover

The JCS recommended that the draft paper be returned to the Policy Planning Council for revision in order to develop realistic courses of action. (S) JCSM-739-68 to SecDef, 12 Dec 68 (JCS 2121/211-3), same file, sec 2.
On 10 April 69, Dr. Kissinger relayed to SecState, SecDef, and DCI the President's direction for a comprehensive review of US policy toward Southern Africa (south of the Congo and Tanzania). The NSC Interdepartmental Group for Africa prepared the requested study and it was circulated within the NSC on 18 Aug 69. The study presented five options for US policy for the area:	16 Oct 69	A joint talking paper for ASD(ISA) and Dir J-5 stated that Defense interests in Southern Africa would be adversely affected most by options 4 and 5 and to a lesser degree by option 3, while they would be enhanced by option 2 and more so by option 1. The JCS reviewed the NSC study on Southwest Africa and informed SecDef that the US should not submit to UN pressures for further "escalation." They were concerned that the US would be expected to carry the burden of any sanctions against South Africa. The JCS considered that Options 2 and 3 of the study would not only prevent additional demands but would encourage expectations that the US would accept or could be pressured into further escalation. They recommended selection of the general context of Option 1.

On 17 Apr 70, the President made, among others, the following decisions with regard to Southwest Africa: current restrictions on official visits to, military contacts with, and overflights of Southwest Africa would remain in effect; the US would support, but would not propose, UN action to request an advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice on the legality of aspects of South Africa's administration of Southwest Africa; and
