Subject Balance Sheet Transparency Website

All...

The Chairman recently asked the staff to develop a "balance sheet transparency" website that could be made available to the public and that would address many of the types of questions raised in the press and by the Congress about the Federal Reserve's policy actions over recent months and the associated implications for the Federal Reserve's balance sheet. Our understanding is that he may refer to the website in his testimony next Monday and that the website would be unveiled around the time of his monetary policy testimony later in the month. The Chairman sketched out a rough outline of what he wanted on the website and we have taken a first shot at pulling it together. The URL for the website is listed below. At this point, we would greatly appreciate any comments that you and your colleagues can provide. In particular, we would especially value any comments that addressed...

So, on the information for table 10, if you could send that to me and Julie Jackson, who is the manager of PubWeb, that would be great. They are in the middle of making the changes and we hope to have a final version today, so the sooner the text can get to her the better.

Thanks,

In response to Jim Clouse's email seeking comment on the Transparency Website initiative, it will be useful for us to provide a consolidated set of Division comments to MA. Paul Bettge has graciously agreed to coordinate and consolidate the Division's comments. In order to meet MA's deadline, please provide your thoughts and comments to Paul by COB Monday Feb 9.. If I have overlooked someone on this email please pass this information on to them.

Thanks,
