

ORIGINS

Origins

It has been called "The American Doctor Who". While that is certainly part of the story, it is not the whole. True, a lion's share of the money came from Universal Television, who produced it, and from the Fox Network, who purchased rights to screen it in the U.S, but there was hefty investment as well from BBC Worldwide that ensured co-control of the project. The script-writer was British, so too was its Director, its principal star, even the man in overall charge, Philip Segal, despite an adopted Californian accent nurtured since his family moved to the States in 1976.

Furthermore, unlike so many attempts to resurrect classic cult-TV shows, like The classic cult-TV shows, like The Invaders, Lost in Space or, over here, Randall and Hopkirk or The Saint, the 1996 Doctor Who TV movie was a noble attempt to continue the programme rather than go back and 'reinvent it' for the Nineties. It had money, it had superb lighting and photography, but it also had Sylvester McCoy, all the key hallmarks and mythological icons evolved since 1963, and it came with a vision to restore, not just exploit, a show that had declined in the eyes of both the general public and BBC senior management.

The person who made it happen, of course, was Philip Segal, a man who entered the arena in 1989 with three things in his favour. Firstly he was a TV professional: on the one hand a seasoned his own account, Segal's idol and role model was legendary Hollywood Producer Irwin Allen – that veteran survivor in the world's toughest TV and film marketplace who was at home with shoestring budgets as he was with millions to spend; who turned out as many flops as he did mega-buck successes.

Segal's second great attribute was tireless energy. Even as a youth he knew he wanted to work in films and television, and he zealously pursued that goal, working long hours to build up credentials, a network of contacts and a sound understanding of how the industry worked. By his thirties he was well into chalking up an impressive list of TV hits onto his CV

His third attribute was a self-confessed passion for Doctor Who. If memories shared in his co-authored book Regeneration are anything to go by, Philip Segal fell in love with Doctor Who right from seeing its first episode, AN UNEARTHLY CHILD. He did this sat with his grandfather at their house in Audley Road, Hendon (three roads over from where the Doctor Who Appreciation Society's Reference Department was first born). That affection kindled and grew stronger as Segal renewed his acquaintance with the programme once it began regularly airing in America during the Fighties

Like many fans he cherished the programme at its best, but felt it was looking very "run down and tired" towards the end of its life. It was around then that the idea began to form of a Doctor Who series made with American money; a show that would combine its traditional strengths – good scripting, sparkling performances and an established powerful format – with the budgeting power that only Hollywood could generate. Segal believed a template of sorts already existed. The 1979 story CITY OF DEATH espoused the look and feel of what he was after: a glossy-looking production that balanced action-adventure, good effects, clever and witty scripting, a stellar cast and Doctor Who's own unique brand of 'magic' in equal abundance. Indeed Segal asked for a professional-grade copy of that story for himself during early discussions and correspondence with the BBC, precisely so that he could enthuse other Hollywood execs with what he had in mind. Even at this stage Segal knew there would be more work to do convincing fellow American TV moguls of his idea's worth than their counterparts in Britain

First contact was apparently made in July 1989, ironically just as the final all-BBC made Doctor Who, GHOST LIGHT, was entering production. At this point Segal's job title was Programme Executive (Drama) for Columbia Television. In effect he was a Script Editor, in charge of developing formats and scripts, sometimes books, into (hopefully) successful TV movies, mini-series or even whole seasons. He had the power to negotiate rights, acquire properties and commission scripts, but no authority to 'green light' a project to begin production.

properties and commission scripts, but no authority to 'green light' a project to begin production.

The BBC were polite enough to Segal and interested in his proposal insofar as it pointed to them being able to farm Doctor Who's production out to an independent, and cease making it as an expensive) in-house show. A move towards independently made productions was something the BBC was now required to do under the terms of their revised charter from the British Government.

By mid-August 1989 positions on the battlefield for control of Doctor Who were already being staked out. BBC Television, represented by Drama Heads Mark Shivas and Peter Cregeen, were keen to remove Doctor Who from their budget books but would be happy to consider an independently made series, provided artistic control stayed within the Corporation. Philip Segal, motivated by those encouraging noises from the BBC, was bringing fellow execs at Columbia into the loop, and gaining interest from one of the four broadcasting networks in the States, ABC, towards purchasing a series. Both ABC and Columbia, however, were unlikely to fund a negotiator, hustler and producer in the Lew Grade mould, on the other, a capable story editor and treatment developer who, from years spent watching networked television as a boy-turned-adult, almost instinctively knew what made TV shows that worked. By

The former home of Philip Segal's grandfather, close to In-Vision's own base...

Features

Editor: Anthony Brown
Publisher:
Jeremy Bentham

4	The Daltenrey's Movie
16	That Was 1996
34	Reviews
41	Audience
43	Credits and References

Production

10

11

14

15

19

38

39

oduction
Origins
Script
Script-Editing
Personnel
Set Design
Costume
Make-Up, Visual Effects
Production Diary
Post Production
Music & Sound, Cuts
Transmission,
Trivia & Continuity

Contributors: Paula Bentham, Neil Corry, John Freeman, Derek Handley, Clayton Hickman, Diane McGinn, Dave Owen, Andrew Pixley, Tim Robins, Gary Russell, Martin Wiggins, Tat Wood

Cover: Pete Wallbank
Chris Senior
Johnny Waudby
Graphics: Martin Proctor

Format: Justin Richards, Peter Anghelides, June 1986

Doctor Who

© BBC Television 1996,2003 Origination:GLA Productions
Printers: Essexpress
Editorial address:

10 Gablefields, Sandon, Chelmsford, Essex, CM2 7SP E-mail:AJEB10GBL@aol.com

Subscriptions:

Final issue for £3.50 (UK only; add £50p for mailing in card envelopes); USA/Canada £4.50/$8; Australasia £5.

Subscription Address:

Cheques payable to:
Jeremy Bentham,
13 Northfield Rd,
Borehamwood,
Hertfordshire, WD6 5AE

series straight away, and would demand a movie-length pilot first to prove the format.

A TV-movie would require a script, and, since the primary market would be America, Columbia wanted control of script development. This BBC Enterprises, represented by Co-Production head Roger Laughton and incoming Managing Director James Arnold-Baker, opposed for two reasons. Firstly, abandoning script control would only happen at best for a one-off licensed product – like a film – not for an on-going series. Secondly, Doctor Who, in its current format had a long track record as a huge money-spinner for the Corporation. No way would Columbia, or any other TV company, be allowed to continue the series with all the radical changes that might be required to suit what were perceived as audience tastes in America.

There was another complication too. A feature-length pilot was a movie by another name. And the BBC had, since 1987, licensed rights for a Doctor Who movie to another company, Coast to Coast, latterly Green Light and then Daltenreys. News of another Doctor Who movie going into production, albeit one for TV, could trigger litigation if Daltenreys felt their contracted agreement, and hence their earnings potential, was being compromised.

It was Segal who made the first move in October 1989. A story

It was Segal who made the first move in October 1989. A story development was pitched at BBC Enterprises, together with a lucrative set of financial proposals and a commitment of interest from the US network, ABC. Key to this working was a signed agreement from the BBC before the 'selling season' closed in mid-November. In the States the 'selling season' is the annual period when all four networks have their cheque books open, commissioning those series and movie proposals from TV production companies that they like the look of.

On 27 October Laughton declined Segal's proposal on behalf of the BBC, partly because the deal included first refusal rights for Columbia to release the movie theatrically, which would have infringed the agreement with Daltenreys, but primarily because they felt the story treatment needed more work. For its part the BBC was in no hurry to remake Doctor Who. They had, after all, only recently announced that Season 27 would not be going into production in 1990.

Segal was disappointed but not discouraged. He even briefly dallied with Daltenreys themselves, suggesting a partnership with Columbia whereby their film would be sold to Fox as a TV movie for States-side consumption, acting as a pilot to launch his own proposed series. It would remain as a cinema-released film in the UK and the rest of the world. However, while Daltenreys were interested enough to send him a copy of Johnny Byrne's script, Segal was less interested after he had read it – feeling it lacked the depth and characterisation he wanted.

Curiously, the next move appeared to come from the BBC. In January 1990 Roger Laughton proposed that Segal should meet Verity Lambert as they were keen that Lambert, Doctor Who's original Producer, should represent the BBC's position in future discussions with Columbia and their latest network suitor, CBS. Assuming an amicable hook-up with Cinema Verity, the BBC were happy for Segal to negotiate with CBS for a new Doctor Who series for a projected autumn 1991 screening in the UK.

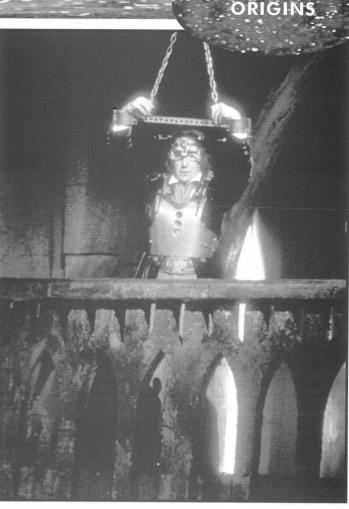

That hook-up never happened. In early 1990 Philip Segal was headhunted by ABC Television to become a Director of Programmes. It was a promotion in terms of responsibility and remuneration, but his role was to develop shows that had already been commissioned, like thirtySomething and Twin Peaks, not to bring in new properties. His withdrawal from the Doctor Who field left the BBC with few other serious partners to entertain. There were rumours of deals with Zenith, Victor Pemberton's company Saffron, even with a company formed by two veteran Who writers, Gerry Davis and Terry Nation. But ultimately no deals were forthcoming, and neither was any film from Daltenreys.

Things went quiet for eighteen months and then Philip Segal got headhunted again – this time by a company with a lot of clout in the film and television business, Steven Spielberg's Amblin Entertainment. He joined the company in June 1991 and was soon embarked on developing new shows for worldwide sales, Earth 2 and the initially successful seaQuest DSV. As part of his new role Segal was expected to meet, greet and give guided set tours to representatives from prospective overseas purchasing companies. Among them were Alan Yentob, Controller BBC2, and one of James Arnold Baker's newly recruited lieutenants at BBC Enterprises (soon to be BBC Worldwide), Tony Greenwood.

Armed again with a remit to develop new TV shows, Segal quickly re-established contact with the BBC about Doctor Who, and was pleased to discover no-one else had successfully acquired the TV rights. Once again he began flying the flag for US co-production, but this time on letterheaded paper bearing the Spielberg company name and that emblem of the flying bicycle. Whatever the reality, the view in BBC circles was that Spielberg was interested in the show, and Spielberg implied serious Hollywood money. One of Greenwood's first actions was to sort out precisely what elements of Doctor Who the BBC actually owned.

"There is no question of Doctor Who being abandoned. It is still an important programme, and when the time is right it shall return. Doctor Who is too valuable a property for us to relaunch until we are absolutely confident of it as a major success once again."

BBC Press statement, January 1992

It wasn't very much. They owned the name and the overall format of the series. They owned the TARDIS and its interior concept but not (at that time) the police box shape of the time machine. They owned the concept of companion travellers, of Time Lords, and anything to do with the Master. They owned the likeness of any alien, creature or companion, but not the character ownership rights, which predominantly rested with those writers that had conceived them. And that especially pertained to Daleks, whom Segal was keen to use as a launch 'ker-pow' for his new series.

March 1992 saw relationships cooling a bit with Peter Cregeen writing a letter informing Segal that Doctor Who "...needs a while off the air – we may yet make another series in-house". But this may well have just been a bargaining ploy to extract more in the way of money or commitment from 'Amblin'. To an extent it worked too. Philip Segal, feeling he needed an ally, made a friend of Peter Wagg, one-time Producer of Max Headroom, and a man who had had brief dealings with the Daltenreys project. James Arnold Baker and Tony Greenwood continued to refine the BBC's position with Doctor Who. They agreed a movie deal was not possible unless Daltenreys defaulted on beginning production in January 1993, and they expressed concern that rights to make an animated series of Doctor Who's adventure, nominally allocated in 1991, might come back to haunt them

1993 proved to be a year of frenetic activity. It began with Daltenreys winning an extension to their contract, and with stacks of correspondence flying across the Atlantic as lawyers representing Amblin and the BBC vied with each other to get the best deals for their clients. The BBC wanted get-out clauses that would limit their financial exposure should Segal, Wagg or Spielberg lose interest in the project. They wanted a non-exclusive arrangement that would leave them free to sell the Doctor Who concept to any other interested parties worldwide, and they wanted enormous service fees for any form of consultancy work, such as providing photographs, copies of scripts or viewing prints of old episodes.

Amblin wanted script control, including final sign-off, total distribution rights in Northern America on all series and movie versions produced by the company, and a guarantee that no other versions of Doctor Who would enter production. Amblin also insisted that all profits be split three ways between the BBC, themselves and the Hollywood Studio that had created and funded Amblin in the first place, Universal Pictures. That was one iceberg too many for the BBC to sail around. They quickly estimated there would be few profits all round once a fourth partner, in the form of the all-important network distributor, was added into the equation.

The crucible really started to hot up in June 1993.

Exasperated by months without agreement on both sides, the BBC went ahead and announced plans of its own to mark Doctor Who's impending 30th anniversary. There would be a big convention in London, a new serial on BBC Radio, and a one-off special TV drama, Lost in the Dark Dimension, commissioned by BBC Enterprises, and starring all of the surviving Doctors. Daltenreys too seemed to be getting their act together, striking a partnership with French-based Lumiere Pictures to fund their long touted Doctor Who cinema movie.

Lumiere immediately became alarmed once they learned their movie might not get distribution in the USA. Amblin became alarmed at the idea of BBC Enterprises backing a new Doctor Who TV project. And BBC lawyers became alarmed at the prospect of losing a lucrative partnership with Amblin. Somewhere underneath all these legal broadsides the creative trio of Wagg, Greenwood and Segal continued to work on a structure that would pacify one of the major players, Universal. Figuring that the legal wrangling would eventually get sorted they approached Universal's management directly with proposals for a Universal/Amblin production and distributions marriage with BBC Enterprises.

A key concern was BBC Enterprises' plan to fund Lost in the Dark Dimension. Having reviewed a draft script Philip Segal voiced grave misgiving that such a programme, budgeted at a mere £80,000, could not help but look cheap and under-resourced irrespective of how clever Director Graeme Harper could be. Worried that such a venture might influence what potential American backers thought about Doctor Who, he spoke to Peter Cregeen and Tony Greenwood, asking them to consider if there might be a better way to spend £80,000 to mark the series' 30th anniversary. The end result was a cancelling of The Dark Dimension (as it was ultimately titled) and a reinvestment in more retrospective celebratory programmes.

News of an alliance between Amblin and the BBC began to circulate in the British Press from mid-October 1993. Keen to flush out the full story, journalists were charged with printing whatever wild speculation they could tenuously substantiate. Rumours of a jive-talking TARDIS console, of Knight Rider star David Hasselhoff playing the Doctor and Benny Hill Show girl Louise English as his companion soon began to appear. The BBC, however, refused to be drawn. Not so the case with Lumiere who immediately became alarmed that such a deal would nail any hopes that Daltenreys' Doctor Who film could be a financial success. A colder wind began to blow from their direction...

The Universal/BBC deal evolved and concluded in January

The Universal/BBC deal evolved and concluded in January 1994 was a complex one and much of its detail has not been made public knowledge. Essentially there was a window of opportunity open for BBC Enterprises to become an official distributor of Amblin products world-wide, including the USA. Such a deal would open up many more markets for the BBC, so the earning potential was enormous. But, of course, such an arrangement came with many strings attached by Universal themselves, and one of the biggest strings was Universal insisting that their choice of scriptwriter be assigned to the project in place of Segal's notion to bring Terrance Dicks on board.

With some misgivings Philip Segal acceded to the studio's 'request'. For better or for worse, work on creating a script and the series 'bible' (writer's guide)

The Movi

In 1991, the magazine DWB joked that the Do pre-production for four years... and the s consequences that the he casting of Paul McGann to play Doctor number eight triggered many sighs of relief. Even before Sylvester McCoy had walked off into the sunset in 1989 rumours of his probable, and big screen based, successor had wavered between the wild and the wildly unlikely. Yet, amid eyebrow-raising speculation over Dudley Moore, David Hasselhoff - even John Cleese - there was one name that did trigger genuine ripples of excitement: film, TV and theatre star Alan Rickman.

Of all the actors touted to be Doctor Who of the Nineties, Rickman's name was circulating around both parties interested in big-Time budget Philip Lords, Segal and the consortium widely known as Coast to Coast and Green Light but legally identified Daltenreys.

In Segal's case the association seems to be purely a case of 'Chinese whispers'; of links formed by overenthusiastic journalists keen to find a popular and high profile name whose features, set against a Doctor Who headline, would help sell more papers.

Rickman's unofficial biographer, Maureen Paton - herself a critic for the Daily Express - twice alludes in her book to the actor being in the frame due to an observation that, "... his socalled cold smoulder, his sharp features give him an alien look, despite the lush and passionate lips". But while the allusion is made, Paton is careful to avoid suggesting that Rickman was ever actively in discussions with Segal/Universal, or even Segal/Amblin about playing Doctor Who. Indeed she specifically references Rickman's agent as stating the actor "is wary of cutting himself down to size for the small screen; it seems a retrograde step

That view adds weight to points made in Gary Russell/Philip Segal's book Regeneration that Universal contacted Rickman's agent in 1995 precisely to quosh Press speculation that he was considering an approach.

Unequivocally they were told Rickman was not interested in playing either the Doctor or the Master, in case it involved a commitment to making a long-running TV series.

But conversely, that very reference to avoiding a long-running TV role seems to be why Rickman's name is more closely allied to the Daltenreys project, who only ever intended to make theatrically released films. And those linkages were only strengthened when Daltenreys went public in 1996 about their perceived poor deal at the hands of the BBC.

Those solids hit the air conditioning on 9 January, almost too coincidentally close to BBC Press releases about the deal Universal and the casting of McGann. At the heart of Daltenreys grievances was an assertion that their film project, nurtured since the late 80s. had been shut down by the BBC, at the verv moment when they were due to begin filming, with consequent losses to the company of around one million pounds, and projected revenue losses of around thirteen million pounds.

Most national papers carried the story next day, but it was the Daily Express that devoted two pages to a saga of how the dream of a British Doctor Who film had been scuppered by behind-the-scenes skulduggery, ending in the BBC selling the Time Lord to Hollywood. Yet between all the hyperbole were the bare bones of the Daltenreys' case, and why that case would likely end in court.

Daltenreys, allegedly, comprised a consortium expanded out of the original company, Coast to Coast, that had planned, with BBC approval and a reported £400,000 license, to make a Doctor Who cinema film. With costs having risen beyond what the Coast to Coast founders - Producers Peter Litten, George Dugdale and John Humphreys - could afford from their own pockets, they formed Daltenreys with the aim of attracting inward investment from potential shareholders keen to see a return from a successful Doctor Who movie. Two such high profile investors were Roxy Music lead signer, Bryan Ferry and John Illsley of Dire Straits.

e That Wasn't

or Who movie might not be released until 2003. It had then been in ga would drag on for several years to come, threatening legal atened Doctor Who's return to the screen....

Initially, Daltenreys told reporters, things went well. A deal was signed with John Keeble, Head of BBC Enterprises, a script was commissioned, and encouraging noises were made by Warner Brothers in America who even suggested Jack Nicholson to play the villain. For the Doctor, Bill Cosby was proposed, then Denholm Elliot, Donald Sutherland and finally Alan Rickman

However, four years and one million pounds of expenditure later, that allimportant signature guaranteeing studio backing was still eluding Coast to Coast/Daltenreys. Extensions to their license were granted by BBC Enterprises, filming schedules were revised into 1994 and, instead of Hollywood, the consortium looked to French company Lumiere for funding. At that point, suggests the Daily Express article, a change occurred at the BBC that had major impacts on their project. In 1993 John Keeble retired and BBC Enterprises was restructured as BBC Worldwide, with a remit from John Birt to maximise incomes by exploiting all BBC-owned assets to their fullest. At first Daltenreys were unphased; their license had a year to run, they were confident about production starting in April 1994, they had a new script, interest from Leonard Nimoy in directing, and, to quote the article, "...Rickman was courted to play the Doctor'

Lumiere too were highly supportive. James Graham, a senior vice-president, has gone on record as saying, "We were looking at making three films. We were thinking in terms of something on the scale of Star Trek. The budget figure was more than $30 million"

Then rumours began to emerge that the BBC had made a deal with Steven Spielberg to produce Doctor Who...

In truth it was Philip Segal who secured the deal, reportedly in November 1993, for one or more movie-length Doctor Who productions that would be made for television distribution, not the cinema. By the time contracts were signed Universal had become the co-production partner, having acquired the rights and Philip Segal's services from Spielberg's company, Amblin.

At the time of first contact Segal had indeed been a production head at Amblin, but no-one will ever know how many BBC executives saw the bicycle-headed notepaper, thought E.T, thought Spielberg, and assumed the man himself was interested in overseeing the future of Doctor Who. Discussions in Los Angeles between Segal and BBC1 Controller Alan Yentob led to a meeting with BBC Worldwide boss, Tony Greenwood, and ultimately to a co-production partnership arrangement jointly signed in late 1993.

Daltenreys certainly believed that was the turning point in their fortunes. The Press got wind of the deal, fuelling further speculation. Eric Idle was tipped as Spielberg's choice for the Doctor, with pneumatically-charged Pamela Anderson as his sidekick. Even though much of this was standard journalistic rumour-milling, Lumiere began to get nervous. A successful new TV series could adversely affect returns from a movie that did not star the publicly identified Doctor and, involved or not, Spielberg had powerful lawyers eagerly willing to pounce on any disputed points of property ownership.

Daltenreys maintain they too felt the heat, mostly by way of stories told to them by friends working inside the BBC. Eventually, as John Humphreys was reported by the Daily Express, "It on what Humphreys maintains was a spurious technicality. It was too much for Lumiere. It had spent over a million pounds but sensed a hostility emanating from the BBC that left only one option. The company withdrew".

A writ against the BBC was eventually issued by Daltenreys' lawver Stuart Lockyear, in February 1997 and was duly reported in The Independent. The text of the article mostly regurgitated what had been said by the Daily Express and was headlined with a photograph of Alan Rickman, claiming he, "...was to have starred in [the] Doctor Who film".

The BBC's response was also printed. "We will vigorously contest any legal action. They had the rights from us but even with an added period of time could not get the production off the ground. The rights reverted to the BBC'

As accounted by Gary Russell in Regeneration a court date was set for Doctor Who

NEW REVISED DRAFT

From an original story by ter Litten & George Dugdale

WILLIAM MORRIS AGENCY XXX

Mansions, Chiltern Street, L. Tel: 01-935-4933

By arrangement with the British Broadcasting Corporation Who[®] is a registered trademark of the British Broadcasting Corp ittle way along, illuminated by the sickly glare of a nearby

JACK grabs hold of the PROSTITUTE's shoulder and pulls her round to face him. As she turns, her elaborate wig and hat come wholly away and Guess Who might cost BBC £14m?

THE BBC is being sued for

THE BBC is being sued for £14million after allegedly back-tracking on a deal to make a Doctor Who film.

A consortium wanted Alan Rickman to play the Time Lord in a movie to be directed by Leonard Nimoy, Mr Spock in Star Trek.

The group, Daltenreys, claims in regotiated exclusive rights to make a feature film. But when the BBC made its own television movie, the plans were wrecked.

Daltenreys and its backers—including singer Bryan Ferry—issued a writ in the High Court yesterday demanding £1million compensation and £15million for lost potential profits.

It said the BBC had 'blatantly potential profits.

It said the BBC had 'blatantly breached its undertakings'.

To raise $440,000 for the rights, the main consortium members — George Dugdale, John Humphreys and Peter Litten — took out second mortgages and used their savings.

Mr Humphreys said: 'We have been ruined by the BBC. They have behaved in a way that even now we find unbelievable.'

Daltenreys signed a deal with the Daltenreys signed a deal with the BBC in 1987. Things went wrong

arrangement with Lumiere

By ANNE SHOOTER

when the consortium secured a deal with Lumiere Pictures, a company which wanted to put £20million into making movies.

It went to the BBC for final approval but claims it was obstructed by BBC executives. With only seven days to go before the rights deal expired, Daltenreys heard of the BBC's plan to make its own TV movie.

'We were devastated,' said Mr Humphreys. 'It was a bombshell.'

The TV movie was eventually broadcast last May, starring Paul McGann. It was deemed a flop by critics.

critics.

The BBC said it would contest any legal action. The rights had reverted to the BBC because Daltenreys failed to get the film off the ground, it claimed.

It said there were two sets of rights and the feature film and TV movie were completely separate.

Star Wars — re-released to mark its 20th anniversary — was poised last night to beat ET's £250million record to become the top-grossing movie of all time.

Alan Rickman

Leonard Nimov

Paul McGann in the BBC film

rile, living travesty we knew. This is VARNAX in his man of astounding physical beauty and clear shining was obvious they wanted us out of the way. We were told one said 'we've got to dump that bunch', meaning us".

The Express went on to outline what Humphreys called the killer punch. "On 4 March [1994], a month before the filming deadline, the BBC's senior lawyer Rowan Vevers wrote to the consortium querying its

October 1998, but passed without any proceedings getting underway. As at the book's publication in 2000 no further action had been taken. As far as Daltenreys, a cinema Doctor Who and Alan Rickman's participation were concerned, it indeed seemed as though

Christmas had been cancelled.

PRE-PRODUCTION

4BOUT TIME 2 一 4 美 ME AND THE RANG i man 7000 E 1 1 一個

Script

The writer initially assigned in January 1994 to the project was Universal staff writer John Leekley, who had worked closely on the revamp of Miami Vice following its less than well received pilot. Leekley's task was twofold. After conducting research into what had gone before, he was to 'wordsmith' a writer's guide for the series based around new concepts he and Segal would work out jointly that would hopefully appeal to future audiences, but more immediately to studio and network chiefs with the power to write cheques. His second task, linked to the first, was to use this 'bible' in the devising of a script for the pilot movie

Writing in the book Regeneration Segal described his working relationship with Leekley as like "having to walk on eggshells". He liked some of the writer's ideas

(the Master and the Doctor as half-brothers – which had actually been first mooted by Barry Letts – and of establishing a family for the Doctor) but was quietly wary of others, such as picturing the Time Lord capitol as a largely crystalline city which, he felt, too closely approximated the 1978 Christopher Reeve Superman film.

The format that Leekley devised was very closely allied to the treatment he intended developing for the pilot script. It was deliberately centred on the character of the Doctor, the youngest descendant from a long line of Gallifrevan explorers who has been tortured since birth by never having known his father, Ulysses. His father vanished during an expedition to the Blue Planet (Earth) shortly before the Doctor was born, and this is the underlying motive behind the Doctor's restless wanderings

He is desperate to solve the mystery of his disappearance and is guided on these journeys of self-discovery by the counsel of his grandfather, Lord President Borusa (sometimes spelt Barusa). Borusa's physical body has perished but his spirit lives on in the crystals of the Time Rotor aboard the Doctor's TARDIS. His wisdom is frequently sought by the Doctor during moments of telepathic communion, although there are times when he is equally happy to shun the guidance of his appointed mentor.

The Doctor's main rival on this quest has always been his half-brother, the Master, who wrested control of the Time Lord presidency on a pretext during Borusa's dying days. Leekley imagined a reworking of the biblical story of Kane and Abel, drawing inspiration from their tale of trust, betrayal and revenge. After the Master's coup the Doctor fled to the barren outer lands of Gallifrey, where he sought out the Tomb of Rassilon and therein sacred scrolls that would prove the identity of Gallifrey's rightful heir.

But the Master pursued him, forcing the Doctor to leave Gallifrey in an old TARDIS machine. Determined to kill him the Master despatches a squadron of Daleks to hunt down his old

Having Daleks in the pilot was an element insisted upon by the BBC. Daleks had always boosted the ratings of any story in which they appeared, so it made sense including them in a relaunch of the series. Like the TARDIS, however, they were given an updated make-over for their Nineties reappearance

A key revelation came when the Doctor learns that his father once consorted with an Earth female during his expedition, and that female gave birth to a son, who was later taken back to Gallifrey and given the title "Doctor"

Leekley's 'bible' was richly illustrated throughout by artist Matthew Codd and Richard Lewis, a Production (Set) Designer whom Segal had worked with previously on a series called The Young Riders. After setting out his premise for a series opener, Leekley went on to outline several other possible episode themes, all of which were drawn from past Doctor Who adventures, but remodelled for a (predominantly) American audience. THE TALONS OF WENG-CHIANG, for example, was relocated to a modern day New York Chinatown. THE SMUGGLERS would be set in 18th century Spain, and EARTHSHOCK's opening episode would be set in Wyoming where Cybs ("slash and burn marauders from the planet Mondas") would be at work assembling a bomb capable of destroying the planet.

Leather-bound copies of the finished tome were assembled for an all-important trip to Britain that Segal, Leekley and Peter Wagg would make in March 1994 to get treatment approval from the BBC, and to start scouting potential actors to play the Doctor. Once treatment approval had been obtained Segal wanted to waste no time in nitching the concept to the four big networks, CBS, NBC, ABC and Fox, and commissioning fourteen more scripts so that sufficient material would be 'in the can' to meet a projected premiere date of 23 November 1994

The trio arrived at the BBC on Monday 6 March to meet with Tony Greenwood and Alan Yentob, who had recently succeeded Peter Cregeen as Controller of BBC1. They were also introduced to Michael Wearing whom Yentob had assigned to be his Executive Producer on the project, and to Jo Wright, Wearing's deputy, who was presented to Segal as the Drama Serials Producer of Doctor Who for the BBC. Segal began to worry about too many cooks Overall the trip went well with the three American Producers also able to squeeze in some auditions with actors potentially available to play the Doctor, arranged by their nominated casting company, the Hubbards. All of the actors called to audition did so by reading a section of dialogue from Leekley's 'bible' where the Doctor is musing aloud with Napoleon on the eve of Waterloo.

The trio returned to America with relatively few amendments asked for by the BBC, and most of these concerned added blood and gore elements to the way in which Daleks despatched their victims. An electronic zap was apparently too tame for contemporary audiences

Officially John Leekley began work on his draft story breakdown upon their return. In reality he had been drafting sections of drama and dialogue since August last year. As the summer progressed Leekley continued working and refining his storyline with hefty input and comments from Segal and Wagg. The latter two had more pressing problems on their shoulders; pitching their whole concept of a US-based Doctor Who series to executives at the four major networks.

NBC and ABC rejected the treatment outright. They were not unhappy with the concept as such. They simply had all the properties they wanted to develop for 1994/95 already, and did not want to purchase any more.

CBS and Fox expressed more interest, with CBS first past the post with an initial offer from their Head of Entertainment, Peter Tortorici of a six-episode commitment. That galvanised Amblin into action and draft schedules were drawn up for shooting to begin in September. However, when a confirmed offer failed to appear both BBC and Amblin heads were spurred into contacting CBS to find out what was going on. Eventually they discovered that the head of CBS, a British ex-pat named Howard Stringer, had overruled Tortorici and cancelled their option. It was now Fox or bust.

Luckily Robert Greenblatt, Head of Series at Fox, was a friend of both John Leekley and Philip Segal and he genuinely was interested in the project. Drafts of the storyline went backwards and forwards between Amblin, Fox and the BBC, sometimes accompanied by pre-production drawings, audition tapes, CGI effects tests or budget forecasts. Story content was built up or pared down depending on the weather prospects for expenditure, but one new element staryed a firm favourite - a notion that the Doctor should meet his new companion, an American WAC, Lieutenant Lizzie Travis, during the Blitz in 1944 London, and that they would later enjoy a mild romantic liaison.

Sign-off to Leekley's storyline was achieved at last in early August 1994. On Monday 8 August Amblin appointed Llewellyn Wells to be line producer on the series, and he began work planning out logistical overheads like studio booking (Vancouver), location scouting (Utah and Denver, Colorado) and budget breakdowns. John Leekley was formally commissioned to prepare a script for the pilot, and the BBC were advised via regular confraphone meetings that all was going well.

There were tweaks to the script along the road. Principally the BBC wanted to maintain the Daleks as mechanical, robot-like monsters rather than the armoured spider-like creatures that Segal's team favoured. Wells too forced a significant change when he informed the group that the pilot's budget would not run to a location shoot for the Blitz scenes, even if Salt Lake City could be used to double for London. By mid-September a fourth version of the so-called 'first draft' had been prepared and this was the version submitted to Robert Greenblatt at Fox, and to Steven Spielberg, who was in the latter stages of editing Schindler's List.

Greenblatt loved the treatment. Spielberg did not! Spielberg's feedback was that the script was too familiar, lacked humour and borrowed too many source ideas from his own 'Indiana Jones' property. He was no longer willing to be associated with the project.

Script-Editing

The loss of Spielberg's patronage was a devastating blow to Segal as its repercussions would be felt throughout Hollywood, if only through rumour and association. It took him several days just to summon up courage to call Tony Greenwood at the BBC and break the news to him. However, Greenwood proved a staunch ally and was able to persuade his fellow BBC stakeholders that Spielberg's withdrawal was not a showstopper. The BBC would remain committed to the project as they felt a strong commercial relationship with Universal was still in place. The next moves, though, would still come from Segal's camp.

Reluctantly one of those moves was releasing John Leekley from any further involvement with the project. It was not an altogether amicable separation and Leekley pressed a case with the US Screenwriters' Guild to retain a credit (and hence a fee) as deviser of the Doctor Who format irrespective of whoever was involved in future iterations of it. Segal had no other option but to contest this view, arguing that Doctor Who's 30 year established history vastly outweighed such a claim. Fortunately the verdict found in Segal's favour. Nevertheless the project was still effectively without a script and was thousands of dollars out of pocket. At the very earliest production could not begin until February 1995.

Universal, in the form of studio executive Bill Hamm, appointed another staff member to the project, Robert deLaurentis, a writer/Producer who came with credits that included St Elsewhere, Alfred Hitchcock Presents and Dudley Moore's movie Unfaithfully Yours. DeLaurentis took away Leekley's script in early October, charged with a brief to deliver a revised storyline within a week and a workable pilot script within six weeks.

His notes from a weekend spent reading the 'bible' and the script were radical to say the least. His overall verdict on Leekley's efforts were "earnest, solemn and derivative" and missing a crucial ingredient of "fun". By way of remedy he proposed a realignment of the key characters. The Doctor would become far more quirky and whimsical ("Tom Hanks with a [Sherlock] Holmesian quality"). Borusa, by being so wise and so profound, risked parallels with the Doctor's father and hence he should be allowed to die early on in the story. DeLaurentis liked the Master but felt he should be even more a charming but devious manipulator with a talent for filleting out his enemies' weaknesses. Lizzie he thought was too arcane. He advocated she should be a girl ahead of her time – smart, sassy and streetwise – and that if she had to leave the Doctor at the end of the pilot there should be more of a noble and uplifting 'Casablanca' like poignancy to their parting.

And he wanted the Doctor to have a comic sidekick in the form of a bulldog named Winston. The former pet of Lizzie's would be found by the Doctor to be still aboard the TARDIS at the end of the adventure.

The majority of deLaurentis' propositions stemmed for knowing how TV dramas worked for American audiences. Big bang openings worked, so a teaser where the Doctor narrowly escapes death as the Daleks invaded Gallifrey, was a key part of act one. Borusa's seizure on believing the Doctor has been killed causes his own death and the power struggle between the Doctor and the Master. His deathbed revelation that the Doctor's father is alive sends him scurrying to London in 1944, where he picks up Lizzie and Winston, and then to America, 1994 and a confrontation with a pursuit party of Daleks, led by the Master. The Doctor's father is found and kidnapped by the Master, leading to a major showdown on Skaro where the Doctor is able to rescue his father and defeat his opponents "without resorting to force". His father is returned to Gallifrey as its new President, but the Doctor must set out to track down the Master who has escaped into "...the Great Time Corridor".

Philip Segal had no option but to pay lip service to this incarnation of the script. Still contrite from having spent so much studio money with little to show for it, he could not challenge Universal's cost effective appointment of an in-house writer by arguing for a freelancer. But his heart was not in the venture despite numerous and lengthy script meetings with deLaurentis. Deep down he felt sure that even if Fox and Universal approved the final product, the BBC would apply its veto.

October gave way to November and to the US holiday season. Enthusiasm from above seemed to be cooling as well, especially as senior executive's mailboxes at Fox, Amblin and Universal were regularly getting bombarded with letters from fans seeking clarification about the series' future. Mailbags particularly bulged whenever the British tabloid Press articles pumped out the latest identity of the actor supposedly booked to play the Doctor.

The BBC kept up pressure too. Tony Greenwood and Michael Wearing expressed concern that the Daleks

PRODUCTION seemed be getting increasingly marginalised as rewrites progressed, and they their foot down on the being dog named Winston. Sherman adopted instead. The walls finally tumbled mid-January Daltenrevs. frustrated Lumiere's decision to pull out of their partnership, began sending legal correspondence to Amblin and Fox outlining their grievances. Spielberg took a backseat with Universal to concentrate on relaunching his new studios that would supply features and movies to ABC, under a new name, Dreamworks SKG. And Fox told Segal they were not prepared to back a script from Robert deLaurentis. Ironically they briefly wondered about reviving John Leekley's treatment. Segal consoled himself by accepting an invitation to the Gallifrey One convention in Los Angeles on 25 February. As well as displaying much of the production art and CGI test footage that had been commissioned to date, the Producer outlined the key values he intended to fight for on the movie. The Doctor would be played by a British actor. The TARDIS would remain as a police box. He wanted a variation of the logo and title sequence used throughout most of the Tom Baker, and he wanted an orchestral arrangement of Ron Grainer's definitive Doctor Who theme. The Daleks and the Master would return and he very much hoped to arrange some location shooting in London with a role for

UNIT either in the pilot or in subsequent episodes

More fancifully Segal dreamed of a day when a huge banner would appear around the rotunda of Television Centre proclaiming, "Doctor Who is back... and it's about time", a strapline he and Leekley had devised during early scripting.

All he now needed was a writer.

Salvation of sorts came in April when the head of Universal's Made-for-Television Department, Trevor Walton, got to hear about the company's plan to relaunch Doctor Who. Walton was British with a good understånding of the programme. Almost straightaway he offered Segal and Wagg a two-hour movie slot (90-minutes excluding commercials) and was later able to suggest a writer in the form of another ex-pat Brit, Matthew Jacobs.

Matthew was the son of actor Anthony Jacobs, who had played Doc Holliday in the 1966 Hartnell story, The GUNFIGHTERS. A graduate of the National Film School's writing course, Jacobs the younger penned a play called Smart Money in 1986 that was subsequently purchased and recorded by the BBC. He followed that up with another hit play, Hallelujah Anyhow, before acquiring an agent in America. This led to writing commissions for The Ruth Rendell Mysteries and latterly to The Young Indiana Jones Chronicles. Success in America persuaded Jacobs and his family to move to California in the early Nineties. A notable hit for him was a movie-length adaptation of Marianne Dreams by Catherine Storr, which was filmed as Paperhouse.

With Amblin off the battlefield, Segal's big task now was to convince the BBC of the merits behind this change of plan. No longer would they be making a guaranteed season of Doctor Who adventures, but a single movie which, if it got good ratings in the States, would pave the way for either further movies or a series. But the BBC, as eyer, could not agree on anything.

But the BBC, as ever, could not agree on anything.

BBC1, championed by Alan Yentob, Michael Wearing and Jo Wright, still felt this revised scheme offered benefits. The BBC's commercial arm held other views. In the Spring of 1994 BBC Enterprises was restructured as BBC Worldwide and told to maximise all of its earning potential. Tony Greenwood lost a lot of his decision-making clout and gained a new boss in the form of Juliet Grimm. Bluntly she informed Segal that as the product was now a film, not a series, and that as no finance deal had been signed for a film, BBC Worldwide did not feel obliged to honour any previously stated commitments. A bigger stake of the proceeds was needed, and part of that would have to come from BBC Television, whom she believed ought to pay more for rights to transmit any movie that was made.

There were no objections by either BBC faction to Matthew Jacobs writing a script, and he joined the project from 5 May 1994. An early task was to come to grips with the demographics of the audience split that Fox's 'Movie of the Week' tended to attract.

Predominantly it was made up of young urban black males and females and a broad racial and geographical mix of senior citizens. Ratings analysts at Fox were concerned that a lot of the mythical elements in Leekley's script, and its reliance on esoteric monsters like Daleks and Cybermen, would not strike any chords with their core audience. It was important that the main setting should be a contemporary American city, with at least one central figure from a background sympathetic to their viewers.

That character became Jack, a down-at-heel urban survivor whom Jacobs, at one point, suggested would be seen as living in an abandoned water-tower. Jack's racial background was kept vague for a long while as much would depend on the city chosen to be the movie's prime location. Jacobs later remembered imagining Jack initially as black, and as fulfilling the 'everyman' roles (the central, normal person around whom fantastic events would unfold), but when San Fransisco was confirmed, it made natural sense to transmute him into a Chinese youth. Chang Lee was born.

Jacobs took very little from either the Leekley or the Jacobs took very little from either the Leekley or the deLaurentis scripts, and cut back substantially on any major role for the Daleks. His quantum shift was to move away from writing an origin story for the 'American Doctor Who', and towards a link-up with the last series made by the BBC. He spoke to Segal and Wagg about a regeneration role for Sylvester McCoy and found that both were very keen on the idea.

Jacobs' draft story ideas were sketched down in a document dated 19 May 1995, titled 'Doctor Who — Very Rough Outline Notes'. Gone was the Doctor's father, Borusa, civil war on Gallifrey, WWII American WACs and dogs named Winston or Sheridan. Restored was that ages-old enmity between the Doctor and the Master, and by way of female companionship he proposed a Puccini-loving medical surgeon, Doctor Grace Kelly (named after the royally betrothed American actress). One element of continuity that Jacobs picked upon was the Master's need to find a new, permanent body for himself now that all his regenerations have been used up. He conceived a shape-shifting snake creature into which he could hide his essence until the Master's DNA could be transferred to a new host. The paramedic subsequently overwhelmed by this alien host Jacobs named Bruce, after Bruce Willis, picturing him as a shrewd, hard-nosed character, the diametric opposite of the Doctor's more innocuous character.

A complete storyline was available by 18 July, ready for

A complete storyline was available by 18 July, ready for approval by all interested parties. But on the eve of renewed campaigning a blow to Segal's morale came when Peter Wagg announced he was planning to move back to the UK and so would have to wind down his involvement with the Doctor Who project. Wagg had been the calm to Segal's fire and without him Segal worried that his volatile temperament might earn him more enemies than friends.

Jacobs' proposal for a seven-act movie contained most of the elements that would ultimately get filmed. There was, however, a lengthy, almost dream-like, finale in acts six and seven where the Master is pursued through the Eye of Harmony by the Doctor and Lee (first name, Sam in this first draft). The Master has unleashed the power of the eye, turning it into a beacon whose light shines from the TARDIS, drawing others towards the ship where the Master, resembling a mythological snake god, will consume their life-forces. He and the Doctor's final confrontation takes place on a surreal countryside landscape, described as "reminiscent of Powell/Pressburger's A Matter of Life and Death" where the Doctor sees images of his mother, her death, and of himself as a little boy. The Doctor's own innate goodness defies the powers of darkness represented by the Master, and his shadow is consequently removed from the landscape. The Doctor has won without resorting to force.

Comments on Jacobs' ideas, coming back from Fox, Universal and the BBC, indicated that things were, at last, beginning to look positive again. But in mid-September Segal was asked to consider his own future. Amblin was mutating into Dreamworks and acquired properties like Doctor Who were not going to be part of its new profile. Wedded to his project Segal did not want to let it go, and agreed to retire from Amblin. Along with Gregg Fienberg, a one-time Producer on Twin Peaks, Segal rented an office in the Paramount studio complex in Los Angeles and founded the company Lakeside Entertainment. By way of a parting gift Steven Spielberg allowed Segal to take the Doctor Who property with him free of charge, leaving one less player in the arena.

With one less investor-cum-stakeholder a budget split for the movie began to take shape. After some tough negotiating a budget ceiling of $5 million was set, split between Universal and BBC Worldwide. Universal would recoup their stake by charging Fox at least £2.5 million for the broadcast rights in North America, and Fox would recoup by selling advertising time. BBC Worldwide would charge BBC Television $300,000 for a single screening of the movie on BBC1, and see further returns on their investment by holding onto most of the merchandise rights, and all rights to sell the video in regions other than the USA. BBC Worldwide intended that the video should be on sale for at least six months before it received a UK transmission premiere.

Sylvester McCoy was contracted to the movie even before its title star was cast, but this assured Matthew Jacobs that he could nail down the movie's opening as far as the regeneration. The Daleks were a bit more problematic. Segal remembers a fee of $20,000 being paid to Terry Nation (via his agent, Roger Hancock) just for their name alone to be used in the story. He wanted to see Daleks in the opening scenes, but the fees being demanded by Hancock rendered this untenable to Fox, so the writer was instructed merely to mention them. They and Universal wanted to get some mileage for their $20k...

Rewrites continued into the autumn and winter months. Grace Kelly became Grace Holloway to avert any legal complications, the Master snake-god appearances were deleted to save on make-up/CGI costs, and sequences of the CGI snake were pruned back, again to make budget savings. Writing in his memoirs Segal is adamant there was no actual moment when the movie was official 'green lighted', rather an escalating series of events and meetings that hinted he could start spending budget money again.

At one of these meetings Segal learned he was being given a new boss in the form of Executive Producer, Alex Beaton. Beaton was a Universal appointee, mandated by the studio to keep and eye on spending and to counter Segal's relative inexperience in this area. At first Segal raised the "too many cooks..." argument with whichever of his backers would listen, but gradually he was reassured that he would remain in overall creative charge of the movie.

On Monday 27 November a Doctor Who Production Office was formally opened at the movie's nominated base of operations, 8651 Eastlake Drive, Burnaby near Vancouver in Canada, part of the New Westminster studio estate that had originally been established by an aircraft manufacturing company. After more than five years in the wilderness, Doctor Who finally had a new home.

Personnel

Organisationally American production and crew structures are vastly different to the set-up familiar to generations of British fans. That is mostly because American TV programmes tend to mirror the production hierarchies used in the theatrical movie business.

Philip Segal's credit on the movie was that of Executive Producer. Like John Nathan-Turner, or any of his predecessors, he was in overall charge of the programme, both artistically and in terms of managing the process of transferring a script into a finished product. He held control of the budget and pretty much had the power to hire and fire anyone on the cast and crew side. He was, however, responsible to studio heads at Universal TV, primarily to Bill Hamm and Tom Thayer who financed and authorised payments to Lakeside Entertainment from the $5 million budget established for the project jointly between Universal, Fox and the BBC.

The programme's other Executive Producer was Alex Beaton, a staff member at Universal whose experience of the studio system gave him a strong say in the logistical planning needed to bring the show onto the air. However, he had little to do with the script and creative side, leaving that to Segal, except where changes to the script were 'requested' at senior level by Universal.

There was no Script-Editor on the show as Segal held this jobrole too. He worked closely with Matthew Jacobs on any rewrites although, as in England, once an approved (and paid for) draft was available, the writer took more of a back-seat – performing rewrites to order rather than adding any further creative input.

rewrites to order rather than adding any further creative input.

Jo Wright's credit as Executive Producer meant that she had script approval, major cast approval and sign-off to certain creative and production decisions. On the BBC's behalf she was responsible for maintaining overall integrity of the 'Doctor Who Brand'. Design drawings for the new Daleks or the interior of the TARDIS, for example, needed her signature.

TARDIS, for example, needed her signature.

Universal's Peter V Ware was the show's actual Producer. The nearest equivalent job titles at the BBC would be a combination of Production Unit Manager and Production Associate. His task was to look after the logistics of the show's infrastructure – anything from negotiating hire of the sound stages, to booking casting sessions, planning locations shoots, hiring technical and creative teams, even arguing with temperamental artists' agents. A sound understanding of the money side of the operation was imperative.

One member of the team whose role was identical on both sides of the Atlantic was the Director – the person supervising every second of what would be captured on tape or film, and the person artistically responsible for editing it into a finished movie.

Right from the outset the BBC put heavy pressure onto Segal, insisting that he hired a British Director. Luckily Segal agreed with the idea, secretly feeling that an American Director might not capture the subtler elements of Doctor Who's magic. Trevor Walton was similarly of this opinion and Segal recalls the day he and Alex Beaton went into Fox to sound out his views on their selection.

"...We whittled them down to three and checked interest and availability. Once we had achieved that, we decided who were our first, second and third choices. With all that information we marched into the network, put on a brave face and stood ready to defend our decision. In this case, we didn't have to. Trevor heard the first name on the list, Geoff Sax, and said, "Fine. Hire him". Alex and I looked at each other, smiled and left. That was the shortest meeting in network history – all of about one minute. That gives you an idea of the arbitrary nature of it all."

Philip Segal, Regeneration, 2000

In truth Philp Segal's first choice had been plays and serial Director Stuart Gillard, but a new list of possibles was drawn up once Gillard confirmed he was not available. Geoffrey Sax, however, came with a few Doctor Who credits that even Segal had been unaware of.

As a staff Director with LWT in the mid-Seventies he was assigned to a Monty Python-like late evening, sketch comedy series called End of Part One. One edition, broadcast in autumn 1978, contained a five-minute spoof of Doctor Who, directed by Sax, titled Doctor Eyes. That starred Fred Harris as a bulging-eyed Tom Baker, Sue Holderness in Romana-style gown and boa as Gloria, plus an assortment of dustbin monsters and a "cheap tin thing that looks like a dog".

Sax's big foray into comedy came a few years later when Laurence Marks and Maurice Gran launched their Thatcher era satire, The New Statesman, starring Rik Mayall and David Troughton. Sax and fellow Doctor Who luminary Graeme Harper directed a clutch of episodes that went on to win both Emmy and BAFTA awards. Sax moved into drama in the Nineties, helming noteable episodes of Bergerac and Lovejoy for the BBC, and Verity Lambert's popular comedy-thriller, Sleepers. The second of these marked his first work with Jo Wright who was its Producer.

In 1986 Sax picked up a Gold Award for Cinematography at the New York Film and TV Festival for his work directing the documentary A Little Bit of Magic Realised, about the life of William Fox Talbot. That brought him to the attention of American media moguls, and after further success with Framed, a 1992 co-production of a Lynda La Plant thriller, he directed Tom Selleck in a 1995 American TV movie, Broken Trust.

Long before Sax joined Doctor Who in October 1995 – enticed by the almost unique offer of a 30-day production schedule – most of the production's creative team were already at work, and had been since September. Segal might not have had a finished script at that point, but he had Walton's agreement that a TV movie would be made, so some aspects of construction could begin.

Senior in rank was Production Designer, Richard Hudolin. More senior than a BBC Set Designer, a Production Designer controls the overall look of a programme, handling the creation of sets, what any effects footage will look like, dressing exterior locations and, most importantly, supervising lighting. One of Hudolin's earliest decisions was deciding on the 'look' of the movie, with its accent on blue and gold lighting gels throughout. Supporting the Designer is the Art Director whose team of assistants, storyboard artists and drafts-people map out the movie, scene by scene, sometimes shot by shot after consultation with the Director.

The third crucial player for 'look and feel' is the Director of Photography, who likewise has a strong input into all aspects of lighting as well as responsibility for all camera set-ups and physical shooting.

For a complex TV movie like Doctor Who, two camera teams would operate, Principal photography, involving the main speaking cast, would be run by Geoffrey Sax, supported for nearly every shot by the Production Designer and the Director of Photography. A second unit, helmed by Peter Ware, would shoot everything that did not require main artists to deliver performances. Long shots, establishing shots, effects and action footage, all would be supervised by Ware and carried out by his team of Assistant Directors.

Costume and Make-up utilised Designers from Vancouver, the one exception being Los Angeles Make-up Specialist, James Ryder, who was flown up purely to look after Eric Roberts' features.

Special Effects saw a stronger demarcation between mechanical and 'floor' effects, supervised by Effects Producer Tony Dow, and Visual Effects that would largely be done in post-production. Advancements in Computer Generated

Imagery (CGI) required that a separate company handle all of this work: the nominated specialists being 'Northwest Imaging and

One significant departure from UK productions was the involvement of Casting Directors, both in London, Los Angeles and Vancouver. Their participation ensured that even A-rank actors showed some interest in the production.

Casting Directors are some of the most powerful and influential people in the movie and TV industry. They are the people that major Producers, studios and networks talk to when the hunt is on for names to appear in productions with, sometimes, stellar budgets. Actors do not turn down invitations to meet or talk with Casting Directors as they are people who can make or break their So when, in February 1994, Amblin charged their London casting agents, John and Ros Hubbard, to begin trawling for British acting 'names' it was not surprising that high calibre responses came back.

Few actors rejected the role flat, though Michael Palin was one who did. Most of those disinclined to take on the mantle, such as Billy Connolly, Timothy Dalton and Ben Kingsley, made the right encouraging noises at first, but subsequently relayed, through their agents, that they had other deals, appointments or engagements that "regretfully" meant they would not be available.

Others were interested and during the course of 1994 and 1995 many dropped in at the Hubbards' audition suite or at Spotlight's own casting rooms in central London to record test pieces. Usually their lines were from the Doctor/Napoleon dialogue John Leekley had penned for the 'bible'. Tapes of these audition pieces were subsequently sent to Segal and Wagg in the States

A full run-down of all those who did test, or met informally with the Producers, appears both in the book Regeneration and the Doctor Who Magazine Complete Eighth Doctor Special Edition, but names such as Eric Idle, Alan Rickman and Michael Crawford were more than just baseless tabloid speculation. Front runners for a long while were Liam Cunningham and Robert Lindsay.

Paul McGann's name was first seriously discussed around August 1994, though his younger brother, Mark, had auditioned for the part five months earlier. The elder McGann was popular on both sides of the Atlantic. Philip Segal was recommended to watch his performance in the movie Dealers, opposite Rebecca DeMornay, and instantly decided he was a strong contender.

Jo Wright knew him from his powerful lead part in The Monocled Mutineer, and even Sylvester McCoy was proud to call him a friend.

Serious discussions with McGann took place during summer

1995, by which time Segal knew him to be the front runner, and said as much to the not exactly over-eager actor. Inevitably, late (and lack of) decision making by Fox and Universal muddied waters for a time. Fox especially wanted to see a wider list of choices, which led to some last minute fishing for other possible candidates. For a time young English actor, living in Los Angeles, named Harry Van Gorkum was heavily promoted to the network, but in later interviews Segal claimed this was a deliberate ploy to off-balance Fox and get them to recognise McGann's credentials. Such delays irritated McGann's agent (Janet Fielding, no less) and as a consequence extra fees were negotiated into his contract that Fox/Universal/BBC were ultimately obliged to pay

It was still January 1996 before the identity of Doctor number eight could be formally unveiled, with Fox still edgy that such a prime role had been handed to an unknown'. They and Universal were mollified by having freer reign to cast the Master. Their favoured choice was Back to the Future star Lloyd, but

The cost of having Roberts on board prompted Alex Beaton to try and trim budgets elsewhere. His first target was Geoffrey Sax who was informed his production schedule would be reduced from 30 days down to 25. Reviewing his schedules Sax knew this was an unrealistic deadline..

The final two lead cast members were easier to find. Beth Hymson-Ayer in Los Angeles did all the legwork finding Grace, interviewing or meeting the agents of more than 60 possibles between 4 and 12 December. Daphne Ashbrook was one of those who made a positive impression and came within cast budget limitations. She was a known name, having played a regular roles in Fortune Dane, Our Family Honour and the glamour soap Falcon Crest. Neither was she a stranger to science-fiction, having done a guest-star part in an episode of Deep Space Nine and played one of the leads in a pilot for an X-Files clone, Intruders.

Ashbrook, along with several other candidates, was seen by Philip Segal, Geoffrey Sax and Alex Beston in early January. Ashbrook was actually late for her interview, but the 'quirky' qualities she demonstrated on arrival, frantically rushing in and apologising to everyone, worked in her favour. Segal approved her for the role that day, believing she had great comic timing, but both Universal and Fox queried his decision – suggesting a more known face, such as Lysette Anthony. This debate rumbled on for nearly a fortnight before opposition crumbled. Over the 15 January weekend Ashbrook was told she had got the part, but also that they needed her in Vancouver for Monday morning!

Yee Jee Tso was proposed by Trish Robinson, the project's Vancouver Casting Director. A native Canadian, Jee Tso had appeared in episodes of Highlander and Doctor Who's rival for renewal, Sliders. His character's name was only changed to Chang Lee on the eve of production. For a long while the name had been Sam Lee.

One casting choice Segal had no choice over was the role of Miranda, wife of the paramedic, Bruce. On Eric Roberts' insistence, the part went to his wife Eliza

For the first time ever in a Doctor Who production, construction of the sets began long before a rehearsal script was even available. And that was because it did not matter.

Once Trevor Walton had agreed to finance a Doctor Who movie, and once a broad story outline had been signed off, some aspects of the show could start to take shape immediately, namely the interiors and exterior of the TARDIS. At no point was reusing existing BBC props ever considered. Segal and his team wanted something far grander for the ship's inside dimensions than had ever been achieved by the BBC. And as for the police box, it would have cost more to ship to Vancouver than to construct from new Construction drawings and reference photographs were needed though. Specifically Richard Hudolin and his team needed to see the console room (including Barry Newbery's 'wooden' interior from season 14), the cloister room from Logopolls, examples of interior rooms (Romana and Nyssa's bedrooms), the Eye of Harmony and Jim Acheson's Prydonian seal device from The Deadly Assassin. They also needed any iconography pertaining to Rassilon. Likenesses of Richard Mathews as Rassilon from The Five Doctors were duly supplied. And, of course, Hudolin needed plans for a London police box.

PRÉ-.. PRODUCTION

The 9' by 4' 6" square police box was one of the last production elements to be finished. Built using hardwood rather than plywood, it was a very solid and robust prop, complete with a working roof light and illumination behind three of the four signage panels. Each window panel had the correct array of clear and pearled panes, but all of the panes were clear rather than alternating blue and clear. Special textured paint was used to give the wood a bumpy, weathered look, but the paint used was a deep sky blue rather than Metropolitan Police royal blue to aid the addition of effects during post-production. post-production.

PRE-PRODUCTION

One improvement the Canadian Design group made was a double-headed lock for the ship. The Yale lock became merely a cap that could be swung away to reveal a slot big enough to accommodate the Doctor's Ankh-like key – also replicated by the Design group from the version first used by Jon Pertwee.

A one-sixth scale model version of the police box was also constructed for use in some of the effects sequences.

The two huge interior sets occupied a large part of Doctor Who's sound stage on the New Westminster estate. Richard Hudolin's conceptual design artist, Michael Wong, produced an initial sketch of the new control room that was very similar to the old BBC one but with three semicircles of lintels, supported by ranks of ionic columns, radiating out concentrically to give the desired impression of huge space. The outermost ring of columns framed the grand, arched doorway, with a Prydonian seal device set into the 'stonework' above. The console was imagined as very similar to the post-FIVE DOCTORS version, but mounted on a raised dais with a handrail running around the platform.

Segal liked the classical nature of the chamber, represented by the ionic columns, but felt the ship should look far more high-tech Victorian, akin to the 'Nautilus' from 20,000 Leagues.... Wong's later design sketches, dated between 14 and 20 December 1995 were far closer to the Producer's liking – with 'steel girders' now supporting one half of the Time Rotor mechanism, the other half being part of the console itself. His final drawing, completed just before the turn of the year, expanded the concept so that the columns and lintels now framed archways that led off to different parts of the ship.

At the heart of the control room was the console on a raised dais. Its basic shape was the hexagonal structure familiar to all, but it also combined the more 'squashed together' look of Barry Newbery's console from The MASQUE of MANDRAGORA. This homage continued with surface panelling that was all wood, inlaid with huge levers, dials, switches and buttons harvested from the pre-miniaturisation age. Hudolin's team intricately assembled the console so that nearly every switch and lever caused some lamp or display to illuminate when pressed. The Destination panel on the console housed several drums that were inscribed with different dates, numbers, locations and times. Each drum could be turned by rolling adjacent knurled dials until the desired words or figures appeared in the display windows. The whole console sat on four cast-iron feet shaped like crows' talons.

Instead of moving up and down the (plexi)glass column at the centre of the console was statically mounted into the console at the base, and at the top it slotted into a unit that looked as though it was supported by six pylons, but was actually suspended from the studio's overhead gantry. The Time Rotor instrumentation was re-imagined as a series of crystalline spars, some of which protruded down from the ceiling unit, some of which emerged from inside the console whenever the TARDIS was in flight. These spars were illuminated by blue lamps top and bottom and were the only elements of John Leekley's vision of Gallifrey as a crystal architecture world that were used.

The six-legged spider structure that looked as though it supported the console in fact did not. The six girders looked like wrought iron but were actually made from painted plywood. Each one sat on a barrelled base and rested against the more robust wood, plastic and metal upper structure of the Time Rotor, which itself was fixed to the studio gantry system. Each girder had to be easily removed when required to accommodate the cameras. The 'new' TARDIS scanner was a rehoused 1940s TV, mounted on a crane arm, that could be swung into different viewing positions by pulling on a lavatory chain.

Interior walls of the ship were covered with marble-patterned wallpaper, but not every alcove or archway had visible walls. Many of the rooms and antechambers had backgrounds of hand-stitched muslin, sometimes back-lit that suggested greater depth and greater detail than there actually was.

The various rooms and chambers were testaments to the Set Dresser's art. Through scouring shops, markets, prop rental warehouses and clearance depots the team assembled a vast quantity of period items to decorate the Doctor's ante-room, library, study area, vestibule and music room. By way of additional touches for fans the Design group mocked up a 900-year diary, a spiral-decorated recorder and, in one of the library drawers, a Dalek arm rod, complete with wires.

A large plaster version of the Prydonian seal hung over the main doorway, which featured sets of raised roundels, but grouped into regular, rather than irregular, ranks, as Newbery had done for the wooden control room in 1976.

The other big set was the cloister room, the spiritual heart of the ship where the Doctor goes to meditate or to reawaken his sense of wonder. At 60 feet in length it was the biggest set in the production, but not the tallest. The set was designed to go up as far as a first-floor landing level. The belfry and the huge arches that look out onto the Universe were engineered as a table-top model that would be scanned in and rendered as a computer-generated image during post-production.

PRE-PRODUCTION

At one end of the live-action set stood a double-landing grandstaircase rented from a props warehouse. Around this Richard Hudolin erected surrounding walls made out of plywood with gothic-arch windows set into them. These windows were made opaque with mock stained glass through which different coloured lights could be shone, depending on the effect needed. Around the room were support pillars and buttresses that were no more than chunks of foam plastic, cut and texture painted.

The detailing, however, was intricate. The set boasted ten torchholders, cast in fibre-glass. Some of these held conventional flambeaux to add to the gothic feel. The others supported staff tops carved in the shape of Rassilon's head. Hudolin had access to an appropriate-sized head cast and this he handed to one of his team to sculpt detail over in plaster, using photographs of Richard Mathews (Rassilon) as reference. A mould was made and numerous casts taken. Steel fixing hoops were added to these props so that they could either slot into the torch-holder staffs or be freestanding as required.

The largest prop in the cloister room was the Eye of Harmony. Its basis was an octagonal platform constructed out of wood and metal that had to be strong enough to support actors walking on it. Stairs and ramps led off from four sides of this raised structure. The central area was left open so that a cradle could be fitted into it, with sloping sides leading down to an oval recess in the middle. The eye itself was a lighting rig set at the bottom of this large tank. The 'eyelids' were curved fibre-glass shells, textured and painted to look like stone, which were fitted to pivots at either ends of the cradle. The hinge-mechanism that allowed the 'eyelids' to open was fashioned so that as one shell was cranked apart from below the set, the other shell opened an equal amount. Four of Hudolin's torch-holders sat at the four points of the cradle, one of which could be removed to reveal a blue light beneath.

The restraint device the Master employs to keep the Doctor looking into the Eye was a mixture of components. Two halo rings were made: one in metal with nails driven through, and a lighter-weight one without pins inside the halo for Paul McGann to wear. The ocular unit was constructed using various items of medical apparatus. A spring latch held the binocular piece in place over the nose, and twin adjustable twin calipers were set so that they prised the skin around McGann's eyes apart.

One other major prop Richard Hudolin was required to build from scratch was the beryllium atomic clock. Basic construction utilised various sizes of plexiglass panels and rods, some finished with metallic foil film textured to look like brushed aluminium or polished metal. The clock unit was a three-sided assembly that housed the three transparent clock faces. The bobbin-shaped pendulum underneath contained a motorised movement that rotated the splay of gold-coloured balls clockwise for ten seconds, then anti-clockwise for a further ten. One panel in the base of the prop had a hatch set into it, giving access to a rail-mounted rack of electronic 'gubbins'. Michael Wong drafted a separate design drawing of the circuit board that contained the beryllium microchip.

Set dressings and flats for all the other sets in the story would be rented as required from props warehouses and assembled prior to shooting

STRIKE

A POSE !

Costume

One of the most eagerly awaited moments of the whole production was that first morning on location near Vanier Park when Paul McGann cautiously stepped out of his trailer, dressed as the new Doctor. After all, it had been nearly ten years since the last time. A photographer from Radio Times was on hand that week to capture the moment for posterity and, within weeks, sneak-preview pictures were being published for all to see.

The response was immediate and positive. Letters to fanzines and DWM all applauded this Byron-styled image, breathing sighs of relief that at last the Doctor was back into clothes rather than a costume.

Philip Segal was no fan of costumed Doctors with question marks all over their outfits. He wanted a return to period flamboyance and said so to his allocated Costume Designer, Jori Woodman. An early steer, suggested in the Leekley 'bible', was that Doctor Eight should look a little like Abraham Lincoln, with a high-collared shirt and a black, double-breasted long coat. A tall hat was an option.

Woodman liked the idea of a dark outfit, but felt a Lincoln image would be too sombre. Many past Doctors had worn long coats that presented a dashing image whenever a breeze caught them while striding around on location. It was a silhouette Woodman wanted to keep. Wanting to imbue an American quality, she latched onto a second suggestion: that he should look like Wild Bill Hickcock. From this notion came the idea of brown as a base colour — a medium brown for the trousers, pale brown for the Western-styled, double-breasted, scoop-necked waistcoat, and two-tone silk for a very broad cravat worn around a wing-collared shirt and fastened with a tie-pin. A fob watch strung along with Geoffrey Sax's wish to see time being represented as an icon throughout the movie.

McGann's deep-brown velvet coat was a departure from Hickcock, looking more Regency England than frontier California. It was tailored specifically to fit the actor, with slightly broader shoulders contrasting with a taken in waistline to accentuate his outline. Three versions of the costume were made: two for McGann and one to fit his stunt doubles, Charles Andre and Jamie Jones. A Hickcock hat was briefly discussed, but was left in the locker as the Doctor finds his new outfit. As an extra joke, Sax and Segal agreed that at one point the Doctor would find a locker containing a long multi-coloured scarf...

Segal did not want Sylvester McCoy wearing his old BBC costume with all of its question-mark motifs. So, instead, Woodman plumbed for a beige corduroy jacket, plaid trousers and a velvet waistcoat to retain the visual essence of his image. The hat was McCoy's own. He had brought it from England just as he had worn it to his first interview to become the Doctor.

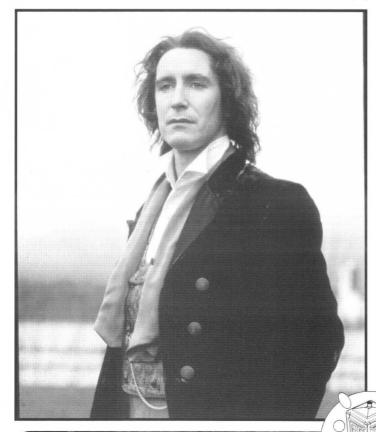

For the Master's costume Jori Woodman went back to Ken Trew's original concept for Roger Delgado and furnished a two-piece black Nehru suit from a shiny, black, man-made fibre. It was a lighter weight fabric than Delgado's suit as it had to allow for a lot of free movement during the fight scene at the end.

She changed her mind when she saw the low-lit, shadow-filled interior of the cloister room set. Even with lighting the set was so dark that Eric Roberts in a black suit, with black gloves, shoes and hair would disappear into the background. Returning to her research tapes for inspiration she decided to try a variation on James Acheson's Time Lord regalia. The result was an ankle length rusty orange silk robe with an outer lining of black netted fabric that allowed flecks of orange to be visible underneath. The sleeves were wide like a Mandarin's, but folded back over padding at the cuffs to form a seam of orange piping that would accentuate the Master's gestures. A patterned snakeskin fabric that matched the orange lining was used to make wide shoulder pads that rose from the waist, flared out above the shoulders and tapered to a 'V' at the back. These pads were likewise edged with orange piping.

Rather than emulate Acheson's famous fibre-glass double collars, Woodman used stiffening fabric to shape and strengthen an integral wide collar lined on one side with the snakeskin fabric and on the other with orange silk. More piping helped keep its pointed wings straight, thus retaining a visual link to Acheson's design. A double gold-coloured chain secured the robe around the Master's Chang Lee's outfit was contemporary streetwear, but black, silver and fluorescent orange colours were chosen deliberately to complement the Master's outfits. The silver fabric bought for one of his costumes was the same used to line Bruce's paramedic jacket. Again Woodman wanted something that would break up an otherwise wholly black outline for Eric Roberts.

Knowing this movie was set four years on from 1996 Woodman added a couple of touches to make some of the contemporary clothes slightly more futuristic. The policemen wore silver riot helmets instead of caps. Grace's surgical team operated wearing goggles, bio-tech hoods and stiffened breathing masks, and Grace herself wore a neon blue blouse and a textured suit that would reflect different coloured hues depending on the source lights falling on her

Make-Up

Compared to previous Doctor Who's, make-up overheads for the movie were relatively small, and yet there were still three make-up specialists assigned to the Hair was the responsibility of stylist Julie McHaffire. From initially thinking she would have an untroubled run on the film, a rude awakening came as soon as Paul McGann's plane touched down in Canada. The actor had just come hot foot from working on a movie about the SAS, The One that Got Away for ITV, for which his hair had been cut to army regulation length. Philip Segal was less than amused when he met a crew-cut McGann at the airport. With just days to go before shooting was due to begin. McGann's insistence that a buzz-cut Doctor could work cut no ice with his Producer, who summoned McHaffire to his hotel suite that evening.

A wig would be impossible in the time. The only solution was a pair of hair extensions, fashioned from real human hair, that could be glued to the actor's head and then washed, trimmed and styled into shape. That was feasible in the timescale, but the price tag was $10,000. There was no option but to go with it as neither Geoffrey Sax nor Peter Ware were happy with the notion of a nearbald Doctor.

Face, hands and body make-up fell to Joann Fowler to create and supervise. Most of this was standard fare for a TV movie, but there were some subtle prosthetic effects as well. Special sections of the Doctor's torso had to be duplicated in foam rubber for shots where fibre-optic probes are stuck into, or pulled out of his body. Recipients of the Master/snake morphant's venom had to be coated with a clear, gelatine-based 'goo' whenever they were 'slimed', and there were several requests for fake gun-shot wounds.

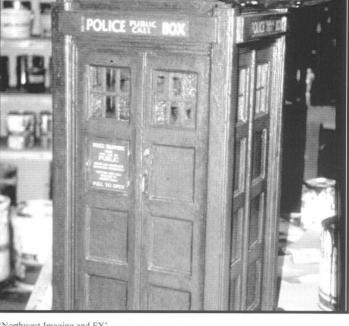

The Master was Fowler's main challenge as the requirement was for him to physically decay and atrophy more and more as the story progressed. Accordingly she planned a number of stages where different make-up and prosthetics would be applied. An early indicator that his Bruce body is rotting is where he pulls off and discards a nail from his softening fingers. That simply required a thin layer of latex over Eric Roberts' real finger, some 'blood' paint and a false nail.

Complications arose when Eric Roberts declined to have a face cast taken, and a full-face mask fitted for his final confrontation with the Doctor in the TARDIS. Roberts argued that he suffered allergic reactions to prosthetic latex.

He was similarly disinclined to wearing smaller and lighter foam prosthetics showing earlier stages in his body's decay. He eventually agreed to a double-hoop of snake-textured false skin around his eyes for one TARDIS scene close-up, but complained it made his real skin peel. He also did not like his snake-eyed contact

Roberts was measured and tested for these by a qualified optician who specialised in work for the entertainment industry. The result was a pair of optically precise lenses with a coating that not only gave the wearer the appearance of reptilian shaped irises, but also reflected a green, phosphorescent glow when illuminated by a white spotlight. The actor wore these grudgingly for certain closeups, but insisted on black sunglasses for much of the rest of the

Roberts also insisted that his hair and overall facial make-up be supervised by his own personal stylist, James Ryder.

'Northwest Imaging and FX'

Special Effects were split between special prop building, and floor effects that were mostly done 'live' for the cameras.

Special props included simple devices like the Master's remains casket that split open via the wire-triggering of a mouse-trap hidden in the pre-cut box, to building more complex artefacts like the beryllium clock and the ocular restraint device that were devised by the Set Design team. There was even a special set of arm manacles fashioned for the 'Old Master' (Gordon Tipple), during his trial by the Daleks, that were sadly hardly even seen on screen.

They did get to recreate two of Doctor Who's most famous props, the TARDIS key, cast from base metal and anodised chrome, and the Doctor's trusty sonic screwdriver, cast in aluminium with a small battery-powered light inside as a reference marker for adding in-camera effects during post-production.

There were a lot of traditional floor effects used in this show: gunshots ricocheted from walls and oil drums, pyrotechnic sparks flew from the TARDIS console on cue, and a spring-loaded piston flipped the Doctor's cup of tea into the air on cue. An inflatable air bladder even puffed out the sleeve of Bruce's jacket to suggest the snake morphant slithering around inside.

The snake was a combination of traditional and CGI effects work. Storyboard artist Michael Wong designed the head of the snake, which was realised by Effects using a tubular framed armature, foam rubber, inflatable bladders and part of a rodent's skull. The model was then shipped to California where it was 3Dscanned by Northwest Imaging, then textured and blended to harmonise its ghostly appearance with the wholly CGI-created mov-

A similar fate awaited the model police box after it was shipped to VFX in Los Angeles. Filmed footage of it spinning on a control arm was passed to Northwest Imaging so they could incorporate it into the title sequence and various other shots of the TARDIS in flight during post-production in February

Visual Effects

Not since the latter days of William Hartnell's incarnation had a Doctor Who production been made without support from the BBC's Visual Effects Workshop. But then the definition of what constituted visual effects varied greatly between the two shores. In BBC terms Visual Effects implied anything that was not costume, make-up or part of a set. Only in the dying days of UK Doctor Who was the creative contribution of Electronic Effects recognised as a separate art, and the job title gradually amended from that of Operator to Designer

In the USA in-camera effects - Opticals - had been recognised for years as different from Special Effects, which encompassed everything from collapsing chairs in sit-coms to complex model work for shows like Star Trek or The X Files.

Tony Dow, the movie's Visual Effects Producer straddled both arenas. His job was to oversee the mechanical special effects achieved on location and in the studio by Special Effects Co-ordinator, Gary Paller, and computer and other in-camera Visual Effects that would happen down in Los Angeles, supervised by Eric Alba and his CGI team, based at

THAT WAS THE YEAR THAT WAS

JANUARY

Wednesday 10 January

Finally ending years of waiting and wrangling, the BBC's Press Office announces that a new Doctor Who TV programme is going into production this month with an estimated budget of £5 million. Trailed as a two-hour TV movie (including commercial breaks) in the States, the film will be a joint production between the BBC and Universal Television. It will be made in British Columbia, Canada and financed by the Fox television network. If this pilot movie scores a ratings success Fox has an option to make six more programmes. The new Doctor will be 36-year old actor Paul McGann. A photocall with McGann has been hastily convened at the Longleat Doctor Who exhibition, and this weekend the actor will board a plane en route to Vancouver to begin rehearsals.

Co-incidentally, on this same day, the Daily Mail prints a two-page feature cataloguing the lengthy efforts made by Daltenrays (formerly 'Coast to Coast' and 'Green Light') to get a Doctor Who movie into production. The article includes interviews with Producers Peter Litten, George Dugdale and John Humphreys, all of whom emphatically blame the BBC for backing out of their contracted deal once they believed Steven Spielberg was interested in making the series. Hints of a lawsuit are heavily dropped.

Monday 15 JanuaryProduction begins on the TV movie as cameras start turning at the location chosen for Grace's apartment: a condominium development on the periphery of Vanier Park in Vancouver. In full wig and costume Paul McGann performs his first scenes shouting through the front door letterbox. Location filming will continue for another three and a half weeks

Saturday 20 January

More than a year after it was originally recorded, Radio 2 transmits episode one of The Ghosts of N-Space at 19:00. Jon Pertwee, Elisabeth Sladen and Nicholas Courtney head an allstar cast in the first of six episodes that will be aired on con-

Saturday 27/Sunday 28 January

Braving snow, ice and sub-zero temperatures a surprisingly large contingent of fans arrive in the centre Birmingham for this year's 'Ayl-Con' event. This proves to be the last two-day show from the current team of organisers, though a one-day event is promised for the (hopefully) warmer climes of May...

FEBRUARY

BBC Audio releases The Ghosts of N-Space as a double-cassette package for £7.99. By arrangement this version of Barry Letts' story could not be released until after its first broadcast transmission, even though the novelisation has been available since late 1995 from Virgin Publishing

BBC Video releases THE HAND OF FEAR. Although long awaited by fans of the series, this tape will only be on sale for an astonishingly short period of two weeks. Contractual agreements between BBC Worldwide and Fox/Universal require a mass clearing of the majority of Doctor Who video titles from high street shelves in preparation for the TV movie's planned saturation level launch on 15 May

The delayed Doctor Who Magazine Winter Special, devoted to the two Peter Cushing Dalek movies, appears in shops and newsagents. This was to have been the final Doctor Who Special from Panini, but the company has secured rights to produce a special edition in May devoted to the Paul McGann movie.

Thursday 8 February

Location filming concludes with various long shots of moving vehicles and motor bikes, taken by the production team's second unit. Today is also the first day of studio shooting at the Eastlake Drive, Burnaby facility - a warehouse complex turned film studios that has also staged programmes like Sliders and The X Files.

Tuesday 13 February

Fans and the general public get an early taste of Paul McGann's Doctor as the Radio Times for week commencing February presents a two-page feature on the actor in advance of his starring role in the SAS drama, The One That Got Away on ITV, Sunday 18 February. Geoff Ellis' interview with McGann is split between discussing this Gulf War-based production and his work to date on the new Doctor Who.

Wednesday 21 February

Principal photography wraps on the TV movie. Work was due to complete last Friday (16 February), but several technical challenges during production have forced a three-day exten-

Saturday 17 February

A venue in Leicester Square plays host to the hardback launch of Who's There, a biography of William Hartnell by his granddaughter, Jessica Carney. Released by Virgin Publishing the book has an initial retail price tag of £15.99.

MARCH

This month's BBC Video releases were to have been THE HAPPINESS PATROL and TIME-FLIGHT but, due to the Fox/Universal deal, these have been struck. Eventually the tapes will appear in August 1997 and July 2000 respectively.

Tuesday 12 March

More from Radio Times as the issue for week commencing 16 March unfurls a three page article by staff reporter Alison Graham, who was allowed on set in the Vancouver studios to watch the TV movie in production. For viewers at home

Graham's feature presents a first look at part of the new TARDIS interior set

Friday 22 March

The BBC holds a Press briefing to announce details of its summer season. At present indications are that the TV movie will air in Britain sometime during late summer - possibly the August Bank Holiday weekend - even though the Fox network will show it in May. BBC Worldwide's plan is to maximise sales of the video release first. BBC Press officers are also keen to quell rumours of creative differences between Paul McGann and makers of the TV movie that some tabloid newspapers have suggested will see McGann walking away from involvement in any of the planned follow-up adventures.

APRIL

- This month's scheduled Doctor Who story from BBC Video was to have been THE GREEN DEATH, but this too is a victim of the Fox/Universal embargo. THE GREEN DEATH had been due out on VHS as far back at 1994, but its release was deferred when The Late Show chose to rerun the story on BBC2 in January '94
- Warner video releases the two Peter Cushing Dalek movies on VHS at £12.99 each. While the cover art still uses illustrations originally commissioned in 1988, the big selling point of these tapes is that they are presented in full widescreen format - the first time these films have ever been commercially available in their original aspect ratios.

Saturday 6/Sunday 7 April

For the fourth consecutive year the ManoptiCon convention is held in Manchester. Aiming to raise money for the Roy Castle Cause for Hope Appeal, the guest list is as impressive as ever, with Sophie Aldred and FX Designer Mike Tucker using the event to launch their jointly written book, Ace, published by Virgin. Highlight of the convention is a sneak preview of the TV movie, courtesy of first time guest, Philip Segal. Strong applause greets the Producer's affirmation that for future serials he would like to see contributions from Terrance Dicks and Nicholas Courtney, among others.

Monday 8 April

The Daily Mail prints a major article by Shaun Usher revealing that, contrary to 'official' obituaries, William Hartnell was born in a London slum, not Devon, and was brought up as a single-parent child who never knew his father. Touted as a revealing article, the feature is actually little more than a precis of material taken from Jessica Carney's book

Friday 19 April

For the first time in nearly 25 years a police box is back on the streets of London. Modelled on the version familiar to Doctor Who fans, this new box outside Earl's Court Underground station houses a mixture of CCTV equipment, rescue and medical aid supplies, even a kettle point for making a pot of

Our man McGann beats the stars to become new Dr Who

ACTOR Paul McGann has beaten the best of Hollywood to become the next Dr Who.

Star names like Jack Nicholson, Bill Cosby, Eric Idle and Alan Rick-man were all in the running as the eighth reincarnation of the travel-ling timelord.

But McGann, the 36-year-old star of The Monocled Mutineer, was chosen to front a new £5 million TV

"Paul is good-looking but also looks like an alien in a way," said a senior BBC source. "He was always our first choice."

McGann is one of the four-stron clan of Liverpool-born actin brothers who appeared together

by PAULINE WALLIN

TV for the first time last year in story of the Irish famine. The Hanging Gale.

The doctor was first played by William Hartnell, who first battled against interstellar villains the Daleks 32 years ago. The last doctor was comic Sylvester McCoy in 1987.

McGann said: "Taking on such a key role hasn't really sunk in yet. I loved Doctor Who as a kid. William Hartnell used to terrify me.

"It's just beginning to dawn on me what all this means. Sylvester is a friend so he's told me everything I wow." when we want was the yet in the work of the they couldn't run upstairs. The film will be loyal to the spirit of past series, but find fresh appeal too."

Dr Who has an enormous, worldwide cult following — particularly in the U.S., where reruns attract big audiences.

Universal and BBC Worldwide will make the film, which will be screened later this year on BBC1 and in America by Fox TV.

Yesterday's announcement, made by BBC1 controller Alan Yentob, ends a bitter six-year battle between rival backers to bring the doctor back to life.

"We're delighted Paul is playing Doctor Who and particularly pleased to be working in collabora-tion with Universal," he said. Doctor

LORDING IT: McGann 'looks like an alien'

tea. If this pilot exercise is a success, promises the Metropolitan Police, more boxes will start appearing at other prominent locations

Saturday 27 April

Under warm sunlit skies the village of Aldbourne is once again the centre of a Doctor Who event. Staged by the Ayl-Con organisers this one-day convention is billed as a DAEMONS reunion. Jon Pertwee, Nicholas Courtney, Richard Bary Letts, Terrance Dicks and Christopher Barry are all guests at this hugely attended event which takes place in and around a number of marquee tents just outside the main village green. Arriving on the Friday evening Jon Pertwee delights pub-goers at The Blue Boar (aka 'The Cloven Hoof') with an impromptu cabaret performed with the aid of his acoustic guitar. Evening fireworks close a day of unforgettable memories of the Jon Pertwee era.

MAY

Cornerstone, the US Trading Card company, brings out its fourth and final series of Doctor Who card sets. Departing from the housestyle of previous sets sales are disappointingly low and there are rumblings from many Doctor Who actors about non-payment of fees and royalties. The limited edition 'factory set' does offer one significant bonus however; an image and an embossed autograph of the eighth Doctor, Paul McGann

Wednesday 8 MayThe full 87' print of Doctor Who – The Movie is aired before its first audience - a gathering of newshounds and photographers in Los Angeles for a Press launch, hosted by the Fox network. Reaction is positive though most of the American journalists are a trifle bemused by the official handout: a TARDIS tin filled with background notes, photographs and a bag of jelly babies!

Sunday 12 May

The Doctor Who Appreciation Society celebrates 20 years of life with a gala day of events, guest signings and video presentations (including converted super-8 film footage from DWAS events as far back as the Seventies) at the Riverside Studios in Hammersmith, London. The venue is very appropriate as the event takes place in the same auditoriums where many Doctor Who episodes were recorded in the mid-Sixties. Also on this day, the McGann movie is seen by TV audiences for the first time. Viewers in Alberta, Canada are treated to an 8:00pm showing, with two other local Canadian stations following suit next day.

Monday 13 May

Once again the main auditorium of the BAFTA building in London's Piccadilly echoes to the sound of Doctor Who's main theme as the long-awaited Doctor Who TV movie receives not one but two UK premieres. The first is a Pressonly showing, but the second includes 200 winners of a competition run jointly by BBC Worldwide and Doctor Who Magazine. The premiere is a packed event even though nei-ther Paul McGann, Eric Roberts or Daphne Ashbrook are in attendance. The version shown at BAFTA is longer than the print that will be aired on BBC1, but is minus some gunfire footage that the British Board of Film Censors (BBFC) has insisted be removed in the wake of the Dunblane school massacre that happened a month earlier.

Tuesday 14 MayFox, in America, transmits the TV movie at 8:00pm Eastern Standard Time, with further 8:00pm broadcasts taking place for US viewers in other time zones that night. Some scenes have had minor trims performed and a couple of sound effects (bones being broken) are missing, but the gunplay sequences are all intact. 8.3 million viewers tune in across the States, giving Fox 9% of the audience total during that two hour slot.

Wednesday 15 MayPublication day for Doctor Who – the novel of the film by Gary Russell (240 pages for £3.99) and Doctor Who - the script of the film by Matthew Jacobs (128 pages for £5.99). Both products are from BBC Books. The video too was due for release today, but late objections to a '15' certificate by the BBFC have forced the BBC to perform additional editing in order to secure a '12' classification.

Thursday 16 May

Panini/Marvel releases the Doctor Who Movie Special, a 36page full colour souvenir magazine with a pull-out poster of McGann's Doctor. Thinner on text than average DWM specials (due to the imposed speed of its production) it nonetheless covers the plot and presents biographies of the central cast amid a wealth of previously unseen photographs from behind and in front of the cameras. The special retails at £1.99.

Monday 20 May

With just a week to go before UK viewers get to see the eighth Doctor, news breaks around midday that Doctor number three, Jon Pertwee, has died following a heart attack on holiday in Connecticut, USA. He was 76. Radio, television and newspaper coverage of his death is extensive and broad with huge obituaries filling all of the national dailies next day. Philip Segal and freelance Director Kevin Davies contact the BBC to request that the TV movie's UK transmission should be dedicated to Pertwee's memory.

Tuesday 21 May

For the first time ever Doctor Who simultaneously features on the covers of Radio Times and TV Times. Being primarily a vehicle for promoting ITV shows TV Times nevertheless presents a three-page feature on next Monday's movie, centred around an interview with Paul McGann. Coverage in the BBC's own magazine is predictably more extensive, with a 16-page pull-out supplement, an advertising feature on available merchandise, an offer for readers to send in for a limited edition Radio Times McGann poster, plus a trail for the start of a new weekly colour Doctor Who comic strip, scripted by Gary Russell and illustrated by Lee Sullivan, that will pit the eighth Doctor against the Cybermen from June onwards

Wednesday 22 May

Hastily repackaged with a '12' certificate, the TV movie finaly makes it onto UK video shelves, priced at £14.99. Some stores, such as Tower Records and Virgin's London Megastore staved open until midnight on Tuesday to deal with the anticipated flood by fans of the show. Sure enough BBC Video ships 36,000 units during its first week of sale, but adds only another 4,000 to the end of June. By year end 42,000 PAL format sales have been recorded, making its one of the highest grossing Doctor Who videos of all times. But BBC Video had hoped for figures above a quarter of a million and their overall verdict is, "Disappointing".

Saturday 26 May The Sci-Fi Channel broadcasts The Making of Doctor Who – the Movie, a 25-minute standard mix of clips and interviews derived from the show's 'electronic press kit' – a pre-edited, dubbed and cyphered array of material shot in Vancouver while the show was in production, and available 'free' to TV stations and networks by way of promotional footage. This hastily patch-worked documentary will be shown several times during 1996.

Sunday 26 May

Not wanting to miss out on the hype, BBC2's Week in Westminster programme includes a feature on the Doctor's relationship with politicians, with vox pop comments by Tim Collins (Conservative MP and one-time reviewer for DWB). Ken Livingstone (Labour MP and activist) and Cheryl Hall (one-time CARNIVAL OF MONSTERS star turned town councillor). The presenter of the piece, Shaun Ley, one of the BBC's top political commentators, is also a big Doctor Who fan.

Monday 27 May Doctor Who – the movie airs on BBC1 at 8:30. At a final running length of 84' 39" the broadcast version is around two minutes shorter than its US counterpart, but is the same at the UK video release. Viewing figures are good with a rating of 9.08 million being achieved, the highest for a Doctor Who since March 1982. For the week of 25 May Doctor Who is the 15th highest placed programme with a laudable audience of 35% and an audience appreciation index figure of 75. The BBC honours its pledge to Philip Segal and Kevin Davies by including a Jon Pertwee dedication at the end of the film.

Tuesday 28 MayNearly all of the national daily papers carry reviews of the TV movie. There is almost unequivocal praise for Paul McGann's handling of the role, but other aspects of the show receive more mixed responses. Strangely, much of the feedback attacks the film's production values – accusing it of being too flashy and "too American" with none of the familiar "wobbly sets and Squeezy bottle monsters" to spark fond affection for a British institution.

JUNE

BBV Video, an independent production company, releases Bidding Adieu: a 52-minute diary of camcorder taped material from Sylvester McCoy that covers his time in Canada shooting the TV movie

made public

that Virgin Books will be los-ing its license to publish Doctor Who novels as from May next year. The huge success of Virgin's New Adventures, Missing Adventures, documentary titles and the old 'Target' novelisations has prompted BBC books to take the Doctor Who publishing license inhouse to increase their overall slice of the proceeds. Virgin will be allowed to produce some documentary titles, plus paperbacks based around their own character, Bernice Summerfield, but otherwise their 24-year interest will cease following publication of The Dying Days by Lance Parkin in April 1997.

Friday 28 June

Announced as a tribute to Jon Pertwee BBC1 screens his 1955 movie, A Yank in Ermine.

JULY

- A major shake-up at the BBC is announced. Alan Yentob, hailed by many as Doctor Who's champion, is moved from Controller of BBC1 to Director of Programmes (Production) for both channels. He will have overall responsibility for the making of programmes, but not over scheduling. That job will fall to Michael Jackson, BBC2's Controller and the man who has brought so much cult television to the corporation's minority channel over the last few years. He will become Director of Television (Broadcast). Another move sees Jo Wright, one of the Doctor Who movie Executive Producers, transferring from Worldwide to Acting Head of BBC Drama
- As part of the same restructuring exercise BBC Worldwide's Book, Video and Audio divisions are merged together to form a single unified BBC Worldwide brand with a smaller staff base.

Saturday 5/Sunday 6 July

Taking advantage of its position within the tourist Mecca of Llangollen, Dapol hosts the first Doctor Who weekend at its new Lower Dee Mill factory and headquarters. A permanent Doctor Who exhibition of props, costumes and models has opened there this summer, and ticket-holders to this first weekend will also be able to tour the steam railway and canals of Llangollen in the company of a Doctor and a companion.

Friday 26 July

Quoting unnamed inside sources at the BBC the Daily Mirror claims the corporation has decided to abandon plans for a new Doctor Who series due to less than predicted returns on investment over here and disappointing audience ratings in the USA

AUGUST

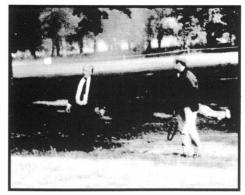

- Virgin Publishing confirms it will continue its range of science-fiction paperbacks, starring their wholly owned character, Bernice Summerfield, from May onwards. To help build a recognisable brand for this series of books Virgin has agreed with the BBC to drop the Doctor Who logo from all 1997 published New Adventures, even though the Doctor will still star until
- The death of Rex Tucker, aged 83, is announced. Remembered principally by fans as Director of THE GUN FIGHTERS in 1966, he was also the show's caretaker Producer from April 1963 until the arrival of Verity Lambert a few month's later, and is sometimes credited with devising the name 'Doctor Who' as a custodial title for the series.

Thursday 1 AugustA memorial service for Jon Pertwee is held at St Paul's Church in Covent Garden. All aisles and pews of 'the actor's church' are filled to capacity with friends and family, come to hear memories of Pertwee's life from speakers such as June Whitfield, Nicholas Courtney, David Jacobs, Bill Pertwee, Lance Percival and "adopted son" Stuart Money.

Saturday 3/Sunday 4 August

Continuing this summer's presence of Doctor Who conventions in Wales, Llandudno is home to 'Icon 96', a large event at the Winter Gardens, starring Sylvester McCoy, Colin Baker, Elisabeth Sladen, Caroline John, Nicola Bryant, Sophie Aldred, Wendy Padbury, Louise Jameson, Nicholas Courtney and John Nathan-Turner

Sunday 11 AugustChannel 4 presents Daleks: Invasion Earth 2150 AD in mock wide-screen. S4C viewers will see the movie on 15 August.

Sunday 18 August

A very successful Doctor Who Day is staged in the courtyards and grounds of Longleat House in Wiltshire. While nowhere near as large as its 1983 counterpart, this one day programme of presentations and events has been organised by Lorn Martin and John Nathan-Turner's Tevnham Productions' company. Tom Baker and Nicholas Courtney are guests of honour, but the big high-spot is a mock-battle by a squad of Cybermen - provided by the Hyde Fundraisers - in celebration of the silver giants' 30th anniversary.

SEPTEMBER

As hype for the TV movie dies away, 'classic Doctor Who items begin to appear in the shops again. First off is Doctor Who - The Eighties, the third in a trilogy of coffee-table reference books by The Frame trio, Mark Stammers, Stephen James Walker and David Howe. David Howe is also co-author of I am the Doctor, a 128-page semi-autobiographical account of Jon Pertwee's Doctor Who days. Both titles are published by Virgin Books.

Sunday 1 September

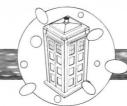

Fire engines attend the Doctor Who exhibition at Longleat as a blaze starts during mid-afternoon. No-one is injured but the Terileptil Android costume, the Nucleus of the Swarm prop and two Cybermen suits are burned beyond repair. Ironically the cause of the blaze is traced to an electrical fault in the replica K-9 prop.

OCTOBER

- BBC Worldwide restarts its schedule of Doctor Who videos with the much deferred release of THE GREEN DEATH in a double-cassette pack with a silver embossed logo and a cover illustration by Colin Howard.
- Encore Entertainment releases the first of three Doctor Who titles on laserdisc. Priced at £21.99 'The Ark in Space' features a digitally remastered print of the story, unedited and in full episode format, with a sleeve illustration by Pete Wallbank. Originally Encore planned to release this disc plus DAY OF THE DALEKS and TERROR OF THE ZYGONS simultaneously, but concerns over fans facing a £66 price tag have persuaded them to stagger

Saturday 5/Sunday 6 October

The big Doctor Who event of the year is PanoptiCon, staged once more at the Leofric Hotel in Coventry. Colin Baker, Sylvester McCoy, Sophie Aldred, Frazer Hines, Nicola

Bryant, Nicholas Courtney, Mark Strickson, Wendy Padbury, Barry Letts, Terrance Dicks and John Nathan-Turner are the principal guests, but Sunday's closing ceremony is brought to a premature end as fire alarms sound and the hotel is evacuated for nearly an hour. Unlike Longleat, the alarm this time turns out to be false.

Wednesday 9 October

Confirming reports that Fox TV has pulled put of any plans to fund a new series of Doctor Who, a spokesperson for BBC Television adds that without additional backing there is no way the Corporation could fund new adventures for Doctor Who on its own.

Friday 25/Monday 28 October

The last of the major UK s/f conventions for this year as Cult TV takes place in Peterborough. Colin Baker, Mat Irvine, Terry Walsh and Kevin Davies join Gil Gerard (Buck Rogers), Ed Bishop (UFO) and Norman Lovett (Red Dwarf).

NOVEMBER

Some positive news for fans as a film can containing footage from several missing episodes is unearthed in Australia. The reel is a collection of clips removed by the Australian censor prior to episodes being deemed suitable for 'down under' audiences. Most of the clips are very brief, but there is a lengthy extract from Fury FROM THE DEEP that provides an insight into the horrific nature of Hugh David's direction.

Friday 1/Sunday 3 November

Dapol stages its second Doctor Who weekend with Sylvester McCoy, Elisabeth Sladen and John Nathan-Turner as guest hosts. McCoy has to leave early on the Sunday as he and Peter Davison have celebrity tickets to a big BBC Television awards ceremony that night in London.

Sunday 3 November

As part of celebrations to mark 60 years of BBC TV, the corporation has mounted Auntie's All-time Greats, a major live TV event where viewer voting will determine awards for notable BBC programmes from the last six decades. The winner of the nation's 'Most Popular Drama', beating rivals such as Z Cars, All Creatures Great and Small and EastEnders is none other than Doctor Who. Davison and McCoy accept the trophy.

Friday 22 November

Tom Baker, John Nathan-Turner and a bevvy of Cybermen and Daleks bring a Doctor Who presence to this year's Children in Need telethon. Their segment is featured in a link-up to British Telecom's North Star House in Swindon.

Friday 29 November/Sunday 1 December

Visions 96 takes place at its primary venue, the Hyatt Regency Hotel in Chicago. Among the many events is a special tribute to Jon Pertwee

DECEMBER

- Universal confirms an intention to extend its option to produce further Doctor Who stories for TV, if a financial backer can be found to replace the Fox network. Their interest had been due to lapse at the end of this
- The BBC announces imminent plans to close its inhouse Make-Up, Costume and Set Design departments as a cost-cutting measure to free up more money for making programmes. 93 Designers will be made redundant and any existing props and costumes will be offered for sale to props warehouses or to theatrical costumiers like Angels.

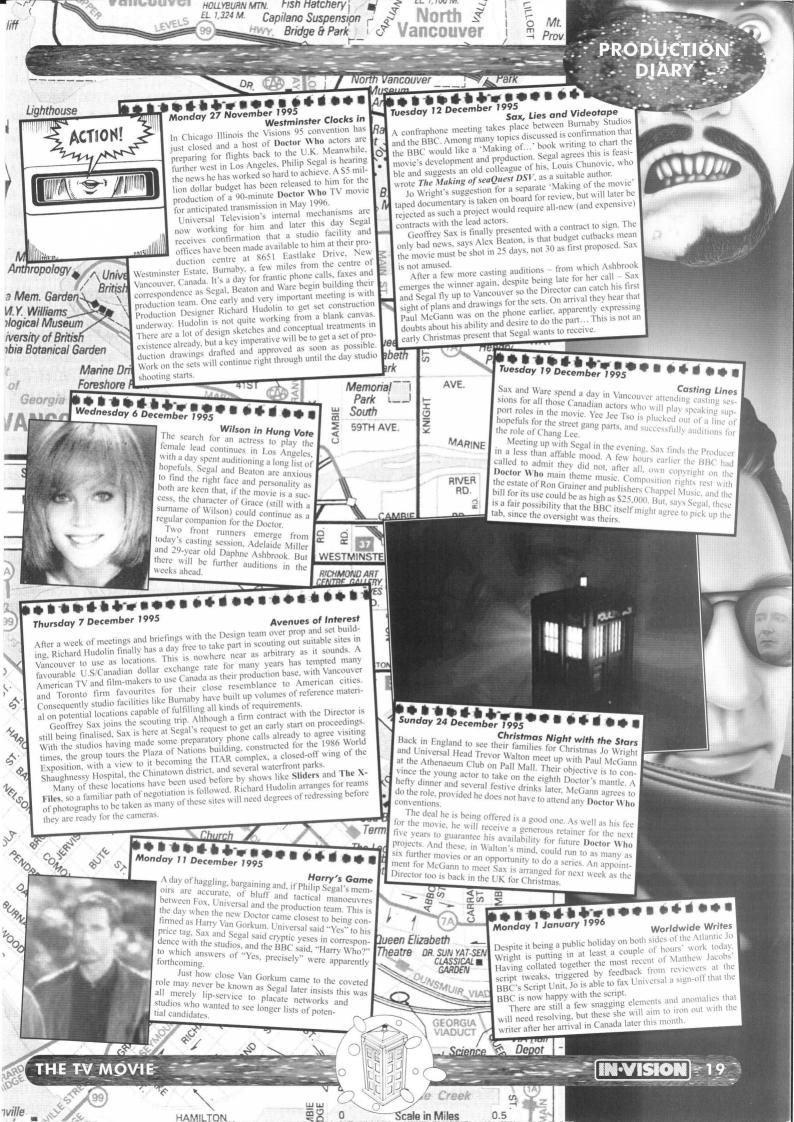

Sunday 8 December

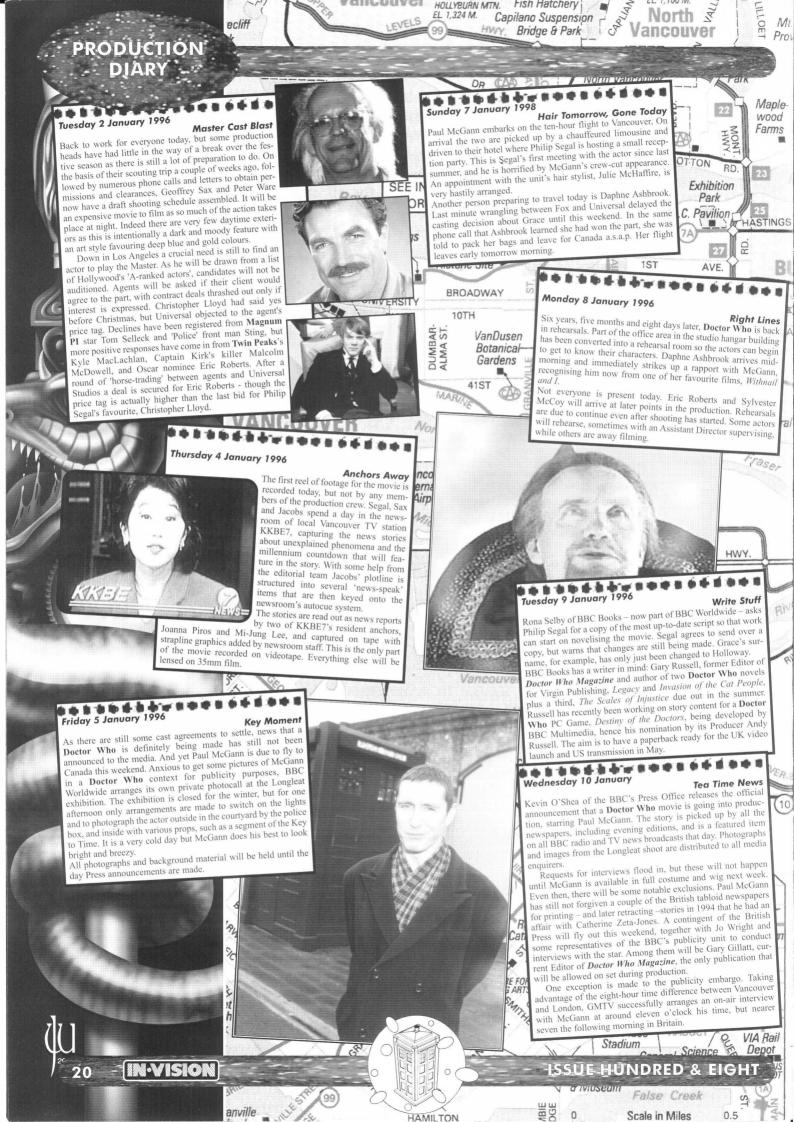

Festive season celebrations begin as the staff and management of Doctor Who Magazine stage a pre-Christmas party at Riverside Studios in Hammersmith. 200 ticketholders take part in charity raffles, quizzes, mock panel discussions and silly games, compered by Sophie Aldred, Nicholas Courtney, Mike Tucker, Sarah Sutton and John Nathan-Turner. £1,325 is raised for the Mencap charity.

Tuesday 17 December A repeat of The Ghosts of N-Space episode one is broadcast on Radio 4 at 19:30. The remaining episodes are aired on consecutive Tuesdays at the same time.

Tuesday 31 December

American fans are disappointed when, at the last minute, the Fox network shelves its second broadcast of the Paul McGann movie. In its place viewers get to see Revenge of the Nerds IV.

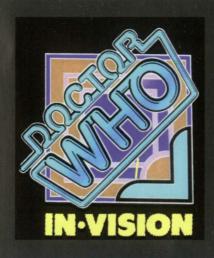

CHECKLIST 16

The collected reference works dates of first publication: April 2000 to January 2002

91 - serial 7D - Aug 2000

Cover art: Pete Wallbank

A profile of the lost seventh Doctors, and an interview with the one that made it. Pip and Jane Baker on their vision for the new Who and the BBC's outline for how to play it.

92 - serial 7E - Oct 2000

Cover art: Paul Vyse

Andrew Cartmel comments on the dawn of a new era while Anthony Brown roots out J.G Ballard and Robert Holmes 'Timeslip' by way of source inspiration.

89 - serial 7C - Apr 2000

Eric Saward's original ending but Craig Hinton considers

Robert Holmes' final attack on a civilisation he worked so hard to create. Plus set designs and storyboards

Cover art: Pete Wallbank

HE TRIAL OF A TIME LORD PARTS THIRTEEN - FOURTEEN THE ULTIMATE FOE

93 - serial 7F - Dec 2000

Cover art: Nick Spender

A 'Wish you were here' postcard from Barry Island and some light on Ray, the seventh Doctor's companion that was not to be. The checklists begin as does the space age.

94 - serial 7G - Jan 2001

Cover art: Richard Atkinson

It's bye bye to Bonnie and a big hello to an Ace ice spectacular. Andrew Stitt breaks for the border and there's a public mutiny over Kane's demise.

90 - series 23 - Jun 2000

Cover art: Steve Caldwell

Elisabeth Sladen remembers

lan Marter, plus obituaries for

Patrick Troughton and Dennis

Spooner, Kevin Davies on the

BBC, the BBC on Doctor Who

and the lost season in depth

THE TRIAL OF

95 - series 24 - Apr 2001

Cover art: Steve Caldwell

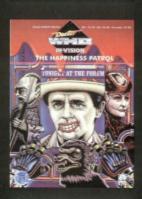

In-Vision reviews In-Vision and Craig Hinton reviews Mel. Kate Brown interviews Sophie Aldred and there's part two of Sylvester McCoy's interview with Jeremy Bentham.

96 - serial 7H - May 2001

Cover art: Pete Wallbank

Ben Aaronovitch's original storyline in full while Alan Stevens has a nice day at the cemetary. The Daleks get a makeover and the Doctor makes a quantum leap.

97 - serial 7L - Aug 2001

Cover art: Sean Ditchfield

Costume gets a taste for the Kandyman and there's sweet revenge against Bertie Basset. Jim Sangster appreciates that without blues there are no other colours.

98 - serial 7K - Sep 2001

Cover art: Johnny Waudby

A happy 25th birthday for the Doctor, but Prince Edward has to decline an invitation. Exclusive behind-the scenes pictures and Courtney pines for a day on location.

99 - serial 7J - Nov 2001

Cover art: Richard Atkinson

Oh what a circus, oh what a show as the Doctor faces some in tent's production problems. Mike Tucker sands down more effective solutions and there's Jessica Martin too.

100 - series 25 - Jan 2002

Cover art: Steve Caldwell

100 issues but companions carry on screaming. There's the making of 'The Making of Silver Nemesis', plus 'Buffy', the boys from 'The Dwarf' and 1988 was a year that was.

"It's Coming Home, It's Coming Home"

It ain't over till the fat lady sings... So in the meantime, Dave Owen gets all operatic as he assesses Doctor Who's last televised adventure... so far.

can't believe that IN-VISION has finally reached that mathematical point where there are no further adventures to cover. Over the years its publisher has offered several projections as to when it might meet its moving target and be forced to transform from a historical document to a contemporary reflection, but here in 2003, our sights are still firmly in the past. 1996 might not seem all that long ago, but for Doctor Who fans the world has changed since then.

Back then, I was basking in the attention that came from being Doctor Who Magazine's sole reviewer but had never yet had the honour of critiquing a new production of the series, or offering an evaluation of an incumbent lead or production team. The prospect of doing so with a brand new TV movie, and the accompanying promise of an ensuing series had me salivating with the importance this might bring me. (And sniggering rather a lot, I'll admit at the smutty neologism "Back door pilot"). So I was left quivering with impotent indignation when our editor announced he would employ his prerogative to evaluate the movie himself, elevating the piece to leader status. I forgave him – he had to cover his expenses for the Vancouver trip, after all. By way of compensation, I got to cover the simultaneously-published Script of the Film and Novel of the Film.

I made great play of this with my office colleagues – "I've been sent the script of the Doctor Who film" I uncasually let slip, so as to give the impression that no such enterprise would possible reach the screen without being blue-penned and rubber-stamped by me. This was after months of being quizzed as to the identity of the new incumbent, to which I could only offer "I'm not saying it's Paul McGann, but it will be someone like Paul McGann" Eventually it was, and although I had reservations that his voice identified him too uniquely with my un-Gallifreyan home city, I was was relieved. Thank the Lord it wasn't David Hasselhoff, Tom Selleck, Leonard Nimoy or any of the other lurid press suggestions.

The weeks before Easter saw a burst of promotion, both within fan circles (I was bizarrely moved at the ManoptiCon convention when Executive Producer Philip Segal played a demo of the new theme arrangement, in between assuring us that we'd be getting every essential element of the series "in spades") and beyond, as my local Our Price Records (You see, things have changed since 1996) played a video loop of behind the scenes footage and interviews from the movie that literally stopped shoppers in their tracks.

This is where my jealousy started to emerge. In 1989, arguably before, DoctorWho had gone underground, ceased to be a public shared experience and become a cult. Fans had our conventions and our New Adventures and they had their memories of sofas and it turning really rubbish before it was taken off. Now, all of a sudden, the biggest event was going to take place under public scrutiny, and our hobby might be a closed shop no longer.

And then there was the awful risk that the movie might be crap.

The jiffy bag from the Doctor Who Magazine office finally arrived, and I settled down that evening at the kitchen table with a generous tumbler of vodka and orange clinking away beside me, and embarked on the script. A few hours later, the tumbler had been replenished numerous times, and although I was full of spirits, I could not truthfully claim to be feeling spirited. It read as though it really was going to be crap - a committee-designed compromise of superfluous nods to the past (yes, in spades) and the generic superhero action played against a contemporary cityscape. In the six years since Doctor Who had ended, many of its devotees had found themselves consuming relatively sophisticated US imports, such as The X Files, the burgeoning new Star Trek empire and its competitors like Sliders or Babylon 5. This Doctor Who script, by comparison, read more like a 1970s Superman film, replete with near romance. Was this a project that had been gestating for too long? Or just one that wasn't very special? The ever-dependable Gary Russell's Novel of the Film offered a ray of hope - it read more coherently, for one thing, seeming to make at least as much sense as any Doctor Who novel at that time might. But it was, of course, the product of someone who loved Doctor Who deeply and faithfully. Had he spun this story into one we'd like?

The next clue offered no help whatsoey-

The next clue offered no help whatsoever. BBV's interminable Bidding Adieu was marketed, honestly, as a video diary by Sylvester McCoy (now officially designated The Old Doctor) but my dinner party guests the night we viewed it were perhaps justified in expecting a few behind the scenes glimpses. Not a jot. Perhaps for this reason, I observe somewhat cruelly, every single review tape I received from BBV over the next two years had been taped over an unsold copy.

Easter approached. Jon Pertwee departed, and in another of my more puerile moments, I posited a Quantity Theory of Doctor Whos - there could only be four of them alive at a Whos - there could only be four of them alive at a time, so when Paul appeared it was time for the Jon's Tall Lightbulb to be extinguished. I made plans to spend Easter Weekend with a bunch of other fans, who as fate had it, would later be responsible for resetting the Eighth Doctor to manufacturer's defaults in the BBC Books Range. Having failed to blag a DWM invitation to the press preview at BAFTA, and stoically resisted the temptation to watch my sell-through copy of the video, I was going to see in this new Doctor in style, with good company and a Nebuchadnezzar of good champagne. Incidentally, the bloke in the queue in front of me to buy the video in WH Smiths made such a scene of gushing how long "we" ("we"? Not us, mate) had been waiting for this to the patient sales lady that I was tempted to substitute my purchase with something now less embarrassing by association, like Electric Blue Volume 17 – Schoolgirl Spankings.

Easter Weekend. It was about time. Don't let anyone tell you this movie didn't have any cliffhangers – the one leading up to it was as tense as any.

Even knowing what an unnecessary piece of fan-pleasing guff the prologue was, we felt a tingle to hear the new Doctor's voice so soon. Even if the Master didn't get to speak at his trial, as the script had promised, wasn't that a cat's eye that was being zoomed in on (an amazing reference to the Master's last TV appearance in Survival)? As the prologue gave way to the strident theme, sounding to be honest, exactly like the demo, I felt the same emotions I had felt ten years earlier in the main hall at PanoptiCom, as episode one of The Trial of a Time Lord ended what was also the Doctor's longest absence from the screens - happiness, pride and empathy with all those around me. Perhaps it was just the champagne. The advance intelligence hadn't been promising, but this was our programme and we were right behind it. The next ninety minutes were for some of us, challenging, at least.

I didn't really have any problem with the performances, give or take the odd mortuary attendant or Professor, so stylised they would belong more in Scooby Doo than The X Files. Nor was there anything unsettling about the production style. The sheer number of extras on screen, and scale of the action set pieces eclipsed by far anything seen in Doctor Who on large or small screen in 26 years. But it did look slightly generic, and Doctor Who had always looked different from the television around it. Compare Alan Wareing's Doctor Who to his Casualty, or Matthew Robinson's to his EastEnders. And Geoffrey Sax here, by simply upping the pace towards the end, made one forget about some of the weaknesses of the script, and enjoy the sheer spectacle. Doctor Who: The Movie was undoubtedly a very exciting piece of television. But when the lights came up, there were varied opinions in the room.

I think we all hated the kisses. They were too ambiguous, because they occurred at points in the story where they could have been romantic. Firstly, where the Doctor has not only overcome Grace's mistrust, but also charmed her, and a more human, corporeal hero might well have begun a romance, and later, when they bid one another farewell, exactly when human lovers, albeit after just a brief encounter, would kiss. Better framing could have rescued both moments. When the Doctor is euphoric at regaining his identity, he could have briefly kissed Grace on the forehead, eliciting more shock than reciprocation. And there would be nothing untoward about platonic friends kissing at midnight on New Year's Eve if they were surrounded by a crowd of other people doing the same. Unaccompanied, it's too significant. And the line "I finally meet the right guy, and he's from another planet" needs to go, especially after the Doctor has taken over, if not Grace's former lover Brian's bed, then at least his shoes.

The focus group was equally unanimous in its rejection of the premise that the Doctor be half human. That it's so obviously derivative of Star Trek, the series that Doctor Who almost defines itself by being different from, should have kiboshed the idea immediately. However, the way that it's subsequently so underused is criminal. Rather than justifying, for example, why the Doctor is less detatched and high-handed than the other Time Lords, or why he has such an affinity for Earth and humanity, it's simply a device to enable the Doctor to open his TARDIS' Eye of Harmony, when had the makers taken the trouble to watch, say PYRAMIDS OF MARS, they could have simply co-opted and extended Robert Holmes' isomorphic controls. It is telling that the notion has been almost universally ignored by those subsequently writing for this Doctor in all media. My own favoured get-out was that it is only the Master who makes this claim of the Doctor, by seeing a retinal pattern when looking through the Doctor's eyes via the Eye of Harmony. At that precise moment he's snogging Grace against a tree, so I'd like to believe it's her retina the Master sees.

I argued that night that there was nothing wrong with reinvention (or reimagining as the producers would probably

"I didn't really have any problem with the performances, give or take the odd mortuary attendant, so stylised they would belong more in Scooby Doo" have said), and that there are precedents set throughout Doctor Who's history, such as Terry Nation's re-establishment of Dalek history. I realise now I was being naively over defensive. Nation's reinvention made for thought-provoking, intelligent television, that distracted from the inconsistency. The movie didn't manage that.

We were universally accepting though, of an American Master, perhaps through having the preceding years' threat of the horrific utter wrongness of an American Doctor lifted. Eric Roberts had been witty ("Did he kiss as well as me?"), callous (Killing Bruce's wife), following an absurd plan (Turning into a gel snake), and frequently ridiculous (I really don't need to quote that line, now do I?). In other words, exactly in keeping with Doctor Who's enduringly unsuccessful supervillain. It's apt that the movie gets absolutely perfect this character who had been so completely at odds with the innovative, feud-free nature of the television series.

The pervading sense of gloom in the room wasn't helped by the feedback from North America, where the movie hadn't done well against the final episode of Roseanne. Another change in life as a Doctor Who fan since Survival was that use of the internet by the early adopters among the general public had soared, and news and gossip now whizzed between geographically disparate fans, where before they would have to have been at university or in the IT sector. So by the time the movie aired.

Other Views

Past In-Vision contributors add their verdicts...

"I first saw the Paul McGann Doctor Who movie in a flat off Los Angeles' Venice Beach, before it had even aired. My friend Lou Anders had snaged a preview copy somehow and wanted to know what the visiting Brit thought.

Well, not much.

Oh, Paul McGann was accomplished in his role was clear that if this story was supposed to launch Doctor Who into the big time, then the convoluted story was a terrible mistake. It should have started with a clean slate, with rible mistake. It should have started with a clean slate, with a new Doctor and a new adventure and new monsters. As a fan, I cringed at the ignominious 'death' of the Seventh Doctor, a character whose path I'd followed throughout my Doctor Who Magazine editorship.

For the most part there was no faulting the direction or the pace of the show - but as with many US pilots, the makers love of the subject matter seemed horribly diluted, transformed into a story reliant on special effects and action. For me, with BBC Who you always had to look beyond the bad visuals and immerse yourself in the story, forgetting the bad lighting and wobbly sets in favour of enjoying a good, generally well acted story. With the McGann movie the visuals were fine, the acting was fine (except for the Master)—but the story simply stank. The movie failed for the simple reason that the one thing that was good about previous TV Doctor Who simply wasn't there.

It's no wonder it never became a series."

John Freeman

Former Editor, Doctor Who Magazine

"Doctor Who is a television series about other planets, scary monsters and time travel. It features a charismatic lead character who improvises brilliant, unpredictable and preferably non-violent solutions to terrifying threats. This, on the other hand, is a near-contemporary slice of unremarkable Americana lacking any of the above. Never mind the car chases and the romance (both of which Doctor Who had happily incorporated before) the real problem with 'Grace-1999' (my own preferred title) is not what it contains but what it doesn't. Chiefly the spectacular absence of any of the things anyone could possibly be watching Doctor Who for. The lead character in this is an amnesiac, faux-eccentric velveteen cowboy: a posseur who demonstrates no special

The lead character in this is an amnesiac, faux-eccentric velveteen cowboy; a poseur who demonstrates no special skills or intellect or steel and who only survives the generic 'end of the world' events portrayed by accident. BY ACCI-DENT. There's no wit, no arrogance, and no strength in this Eighth Doctor. He's just a bad wig atop half-remembered clichés of Pertwee and Baker (T), a babbler of uninspiring half-truths. 'I came back to life before your eyes!' he pouts. 'No you didn't' the comely Dr Holloway should have (accurately) replied, that'd have shut him up.

The omnipresence of the Seal of Rassilon is all very well and good, but when Philip Seal grasped for the substance, but caught only the shadow, of Doctor Who the end is result was an under running, under whelming trife. Grace: 1999 is saved from being a complete waste of everyone's time by Eric Roberts and his neck-snapping, lip-smacking dressing for the occasion. Now if he'd have played the title role, we knew its succession by a series was by no means guaranteed.

for the occasion. Now if he'd have played the title role, we might have got somewhere, but as it is this remains 88 of the series most disappointed, and self-deluded minutes.

We drank some more, and the following day, cheered up only by our host reading some unintentionally mawkish tributes to Jon Pertwee culled from Usenet, we went our separate ways. The movie aired on BBC1 that night. To my knowledge, none of us watched it.

The intervening years have been relatively kind to the production. The lazy cliché about Doctor Who fans' attitude to the series, that "It's not as good as it used to be", is explicable, at least in part, by the way that old Doctor Who doesn't have the hard job of representing what the general public is also now watching, and signaling ongoing trends in the series. For example, one can now watch some of then products of John Nathan-Turner's flirtation with light entertainment ideals with relative ease, knowing they do not represent Doctor Who's current agenda and direction. And, so, almost as soon a there was no risk of a series, Segal's interpretation of Doctor Who became just as historically academic as say, John Wiles', or Graham Williams'.

That has made the movie easier to return to in a forgiving light. It makes a magnificent spouse-friendly DVD, for example, into many other forms before, but as the use of absence cliffhangers reprises now working in its favour, as does its mission to introduce

Madam Butterfly indicates, this is the nearest it was ever going to come to opera"

"Doctor Who had attempted to fit

Doctor Who to new viewers. And for the devoted viewer, now numbed to, or at least accepting, so of the liberties the text itself had taken with the integrity of Doctor Who, its realisation is lastingly impressive.

I find it almost impossible to believe that the Geoffrey Sax who directed this, is the same Geoffrey Sax who directed LWT's unsubtle political comedy The New Statesman, so visually style-free, it was essentially a radio programme on television. By contrast, his visuals turn this sow's ear into such a silk purse that it would be as, if not more enjoyable, if the dialogue were rendered in Italian. And that would be quite apt. Doctor Who had attempted to fit into many other forms before - horror film, comedy western, political drama, but as the use of Puccini's Madam Butterfly indicates, this is the nearest it was ever going to come to opera. Look at Paul McGann's vigil in the wilderness of mirrors and imagine him delivering a libretto about the empty vacuum in his soul, before singing rather than screaming "Who am I?" And what are the declamatory climactic scenes in the redundantlynamed cloister room, as the Doctor and Master face forward, each frantically putting his case, if not the finale of a grand opera on it's showcase set?

There are some visual motifs entirely absent from the published script that inject the production with a desperatelyneeded serum of class. Eyes are returned to again and again the Master's eyes, the dead fish's eye, the Eye of Harmony. When we see through the Doctor's eyes, it is with an overexposed washed-out look that is not, as I'd first thought an attempt to depict his post-rebirth confusion, since it persists to his later point of view of sinister, black-eyed Grace. The cutting between the morgue attendant watching Frankenstein, as the Doctor and the Master are simultaneously reborn is one way of showing they are two sides of the same coin, but I now prefer the later shots as they're both facing forwards in the cloister room, alternately showing one half of the Doctor's face and then the other half of the Master's.

No preceding BBC Television production-line style of Doctor Who story could conceivably have had time to add flourishes like this. For all the damage that may have happened to the script as it stewed for years in development hell, there was an equal amount of repair carried out by a director who appeared to have had more freedom than any of his predecessors. imagine a really good, foolproof, present-day, Earthbased Doctor Who script, SPEARHEAD FROM SPACE, OF THE DAY OF

THE DALEKS made to this standard. It would unsurpassable the best Doctor Who ever. I can tell you're drooling at the

That's just an (admittedly enjoyable) fantasy. What has the TV movie really bequeathed Doctor Who fans? A new Doctor, certainly, whose adventures in print and on CD have been guided towards orthodox acceptability by the consensual experience of the fans-turned-professionals behind them. What, to the public, may have been a short lap of honour for the Doctor became a serendipitous revamp - without this film there could have been no Banquo Legacy, no Turing Test, no Storm Warning, no Chimes of Midnight. For that, I can forgive it a lot.

It also changed the way that public Doctor Who can develop, in sudden visible spurts, rather than in a continuously variable stream. As I write this, it has just been announced that McGann's Withnail and I co-star Richard E. Grant will play the Doctor in an animated adventure for the series 40th anniversary this year, with (you'll excuse my cynicism) a follow-on series hinted at strongly. Once again, I, and I'm sure many others, are eagerly anticipating the effects this will seed in the creative worlds of Doctor and trans-formed into Patrick Troughton. I focus on the changing of the lead arguable; it's another element that focus on the changing of the lead actor was a good one is arguable; it's another element that has to be explained (like the Daleks, the TARDIS, the Master, etc) and can be seen as a stumbling block in just getting on with the story. But I'm glad it's there and, most of all, I'm glad Sylvester

McCoy took the trip to Vancouver. He didn't have to do it. He hadn't been the Doctor for years... and I'm not especially fond of his performance. But when he sat drinking tea in the plush TARDIS control room I was just so happy him.

Although it would be wrong to say that I 'made do' with the Virgin New Adventures, as I'm a huge fan of Doctor Who novels, there really is nothing quite like seeing your hero on screen. What I wasn't expecting was his appearance to be so brief. We don't learn who this funny little man is and I was shocked that 'The Woman Who Killed Doctor Who' - Grace Holloway - ends up being the new Doctor's best friend. Okay, so the gurning on the slab in the hospital morturary was a mistake - receptration is a mystical anazy. mortuary was a mistake - regeneration is a mystical, amazing event, not a chance to see who can pull the funniest face - but, like all regenerations, when the Doctor is replaced, a little of my childhood is lost too – even if I was 10 days shy of 26 when it aired!

Neil Corry, Editor Film Review

"The really frustrating thing about this film is how nearly right it all is. Sudden plagues of ducks, abrupt non-sequiturs, a plausible villain (to his gullible sidekick, at any rate) and a lot of superb and understated offhand sight-gags - if I'd seen these in any US TV movie I'd be thinking 'it's all bit like Doctor Who. Did the writer grow up in 70s Blratian?' Only a few small edits and you have a decent, expensive-looking Doctor Who film, with the TARDIS seeming like the threat seeming like the threat.

expensiveroomic Dotton who him, with the FARDIS seeming like the threat.

You can try it at home. Take everything up to the fishhead being severed, and reconfigure it as a flashback when the Doctor regains his memory. That way you get a legitimate use of the Voice-over without annoying casual viewers, and can dispense with the least sayable lines in screen history as McGann info-dumps. McCoy is only really there for completists, and anyone who doesn't know about the TARDIS, regeneration or Time Lords will get it all as a surprise, using Grace and Chang Lee as the viewpoint audience-identification characters they chould have been, With the TARDIS interior as a surprise for newbies, the regeneration as a shock (and McGann's voice at the start wreeks that) and the Master's story superficially convincing, the audience learns to trust the Doctor as Grace does. Skiffy RomCom 101.

There's still that ending, but the strong hint that Grace is the Doctor's mum (the Leonardo St Anne is a big giveaway) might even excuse this..."

Jim Smith

"Well, Doctor Who died twice today," commented Alec Charles as the preview tape rewound on the Monday that Jon Pertwee's death was announced. Not quite, but the movie disappointed in one crucial area (the plot).

Too many cooks. Once you hear the full behind-the-scenes story, it's clear that's the problem – the McGann movie is an assemblage of scenes and set-pieces that made it to the final script because one executive producer liked them, even though the scenes and concepts that set them up had been cut at the behest of another exec. Nobody had a clear view of what they were hoping to achieve, and the authority to ensure they did so.

So, we have a stream of random, stranded moments. So, we have a stream of random, stranded moments. Grace and Chang Lee's stories would make so much more sense in the 'Day of the Dead' script, where we'd have learnt more about the tragedies in their past. The Millennium star plotline would have ensured that the Doctor was tackling an existing threat that the Master had brought to fruition, rather than the rather unheroic concept onscreen (the TARDIS is the danger)... and so on.

The upside is that, like another story whose set pieces simply fail to gel into a whole, the individual bits and pieces of the movie remain immensely enjoyable. There can be few Doctor Who stories where seene access is such a boon simply skip to your favourite bit and enjoy the all the little moments which shouldn't have worked, but do. My person-flavourite is the Doctor and Grace holding hands as they moments which shouldn't have worked, but do. My personal favourite is the Doctor and Grace holding hands as they dash for the motorbike, like kids in a playground.

In that sense, the movie does capture the spirit of Doctor Who—it's the unexpected bits which charm. And of course there's also the design of the TARDIS—superb, but utterly impractical for a follow-up series unless it was limited to bottle shows—Geoffrey Sax's direction (no surprise to anyone who'd seen him turn London into a place of brooding evil in the Bergerae episode A Man of Sorrows) and Paul McGann's in-at-the-deep and swimming like a champ of a Doctor. Nice video, shame about the script, really." Doctor. Nice video, shame about the script, really. Anthony Brown

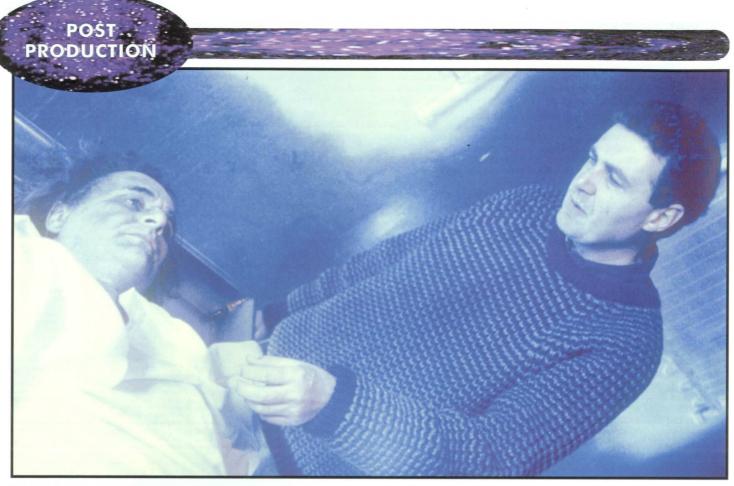

Cardiff to buy the Doctor Who movie on video. The tape was playing on in-store monitors and a small boy ran out to excitedly tell his friends Sylvester McCoy was dying onscreen. "That's nothing new," I commented, 'he did that every week anyway." Some members of the queue laughed. The movie was an excellent example of event marketing and that's exactly how my friends and I treated it. I persuad-ed my mum to bake a jam sponge and decorate it with blue icing. I then decorated the icing with stars, a picture of Paul McGann and candles. one for each of the preceding Doctors. My friends and I watched the movie in a room filled with sci-fi memorabilia. We were joined by members of the Cowbridge Crew – teenage sophisticates who hung out at the local comics stall smoking dope and projectile vomiting. At several points in the film they laughed with dersion. Cardiff to buy the Doctor Who movie on video. The tape

At several points in the film they laughed with derision.

I took a photograph of my friends attacking the cake. I think I hoped to flog it to the local paper – 'Cardiff fans have their knives out for the new Dr Who.' Rest assured none of us really felt that strongly about it. Just mild embarrass-

Tim Robins, first editor of Space and Time

Post Production

Geoffrey Sax took a couple of days off immediately after production wrapped, leaving the first stages of editing together a rough cut of the movie to Editor, Patrick Lussier. Over at Burnaby the job of packing away the sets began. Everything that had been rented in terms of props and set dressings was duly returned, but all components tailor made for the two TARDIS sets were carefully tagged and put into storage. A provisional booking of the sound stage from July onwards was made on the assumption that a series would be commissioned by then.

Sax and Lussier spent nearly two weeks in an editing suite pulling together their 90-minute Director's cut. During that period little else in the way of production could move ahead as so much depended on the precise timings of what sequences were kept in and what footage was lost. Even elements like creating the title sequence could not begin until a finite running length was known.

With an eye to creating pace and tension Sax split scenes up far more than Jacobs had imagined. A single scene might last two minutes net, but by interspersing it with another scene or by adding in additional cutaways, its gross duration might be nearer three. The Director also added some cinematic effects that were part of his own 'house style'. Grace's slow-motion run through the hospital was an artistic rather than a narrative device. Likewise the multiple overlays and cross-fades as the Doctor carries Grace and Chang Lee's bodies to the cloister room landing before their resurrections.

Part of Lussier's expertise lay in knowing how to 'Americanise' an essentially Canadian production. This extended not only to a sound knowledge of editing action scenes together, but also to knowing where, and from what source, to place stock footage film to blend it with similar landscapes found in Vancouver. The Editor knew, for example, exactly where to find a travelling shot of San Fransisco's Golden Gate Bridge at night to segue in with a pan down from the Burrard Bridge to Grace and the Doctor in Vanier Park.

Minus dedicated sound and CGI effects, music and overdubbed voice tracks, a rough cut of the movie was presented to Fox and the BBC on Monday 11 March. Caption slides were inserted for precise intervals of time to cover missing effects and title footage, and music was supplied from stock tracks that would give hints to the mood the Director wanted for any given scene.

CGI work was carried out by Northwest Imaging and Effects throughout March and early April, using digitised footage of those scenes requiring effects. The movie's biggest component in terms of time on screen was the morphant snake, yet this was predominantly one of the easiest to build. Software to shape and animate a blob had been developed for motion pictures like 'Terminator II' and was available for purchase. The new bit added by Northwest was a translucent head for the creature, created by rendering in 3D a conceptual drawing of the snake, drafted by Michael Wong. Oddly the BBC objected to the snake's head when they saw on-line edits of the movie, feeling that it looked and moved rather comically. Shots of it were subsequently reduced to a bare minimum.

The title sequence mixed another commercially available product, footage of a 'wormhole in space' (used in several of the Star Trek spin-offs), and star-field backgrounds with specially shot elements like the TARDIS and the planet miniatures. The title logo was chosen personally by Philip Segal. Told that he could not use the 'diamond' device, he opted to maintain continuity with the series by adapting another of Bernard Lodge's creations – the 'Asymmetrical H' logo produced for the first four Jon Pertwee seasons.

Roof effects for the cloister room and the TARDIS control room were complicated to achieve. Both required the building of intricate models that were to scale with the original sets. These models were 3D-scanned into Northwest's computer network, then edited to remove unwanted elements. Remaining imagery was textured, shaded and rendered to match in with the studio sets, and the star-field backgrounds added. The tricky bit was matching and blending this footage over the digitised liveaction scenes, brushing over any seams, and then maintaining the model's perspective as cameras on the live set changed angles. The bats in the cloister room were another example of bought-in software. Geoffrey Sax's belief was that there should have been more of them.

Titles and effects were almost the last elements to be added to the on-line edited version on 22 April. There were minor edits and tweaks performed almost up to transmission on both sides of the Atlantic, but effectively Patrick Lussier and Geoffrey Sax's work was done by 2 May.

Ph. a fi as ear

Music and Sound

Philip Segal was adamant from the start that he wanted a fully orchestral score for his Doctor Who rather than as he termed it, the "synthesised wees and wahs" of earlier programmes. His choice of composer/arranger was Pasadena graduate John Debney, who had worked with Segal on seaQuest DSV for Amblin. Debney was put in overall charge of arranging the Doctor Who movie score, but quickly realised, after talking to Segal and Sax, that he needed more help since virtually the entire production would have surrounding musical undercurrents.

His main support was John Sponsier, a graduate from the University of Pasadena who was a very fast and efficient arranger as well as a composer in his own right. The third member of the group was Louis Febre, a composer of music for films, commercials and TV series such as MTM's The Cape. Febre was a talented composer of musical cues—short bursts of music to convey a mood or underscore sequences of events. As such he was closer in spirit to traditional composers of Doctor Who incidental music, but he also brought to the table a great knowledge of music, and was tasked by Debney with researching all of the stock tracks that would be used.

Once rights had been cleared to use Ron Grainer's original title music Debney worked on a 1' 38" version for the opening titles and a 50" version for the end credits. He chose to ignore the main "da ba da dum, da ba da dum" theme in favour of the middle-eight section, heard only in the closing credits of Sixties and early Seventies end titles. Sponsier developed this into an arrangement for a 60-piece orchestra of session musicians and these tracks, along with another 80 minutes of material, were recorded on Tuesday 16 and Wednesday 17 April 1996 in California.

Debney saw his task as creating themes for the four main characters. The composed urgent, up-tempo cues for Chang Lee, romantic yet traditional underscores for Grace, sweeping, sometimes ethereal backgrounds for the Doctor, and what Debney himself described as "larger than life, grandiose forms" for the Master in his many bodies throughout the show.

Largely it was Sponsier who fleshed these themes out, determining the spread of instruments needed to create the right mood. Febre composed a few cues (In the Ambulance, Break Out and City View), but his input was mainly suggesting a style, based on his own vast knowledge of music. When Segal asked for an alternative to Bing Crosby's rendition of 'Swing on a Star' – as the record the Doctor is playing in the TARDIS – it was Febre who proposed 'In a Dream', performed by Pat Hodge, for its focus on the word 'time' in the lyrics. Other stock tracks included 54" of 'All Dressed Up' by Jim Latham, 32" of 'Sushi Tonight' by Carol Ann Wood, and more than three minutes of 'Un Bel Di' by Grace's favourite composer, Puccini.

Nearly a minute's worth of excepts from James Whales 1931 adaptation of Frankenstein were incorporated into the finished movie – sometimes prominently on screen, sometimes just glimpsed in the background.

During Doctor Who's previous lives on BBC Television there had been many occasions where soundtracks recorded on location had proved unusable for broadcast due to varieties of reasons. A buffeting wind on the day filming was done in a quarry at Reigate for FRONTIER IN SPACE, for example, dictated a need for the entire speaking cast to attend a Post Production dubbing session to retape their lines. But while this is a rare occurrence for the majority of BBC shows, it is standard practice for movies or filmed TV series produced in America.

Once a rough cut of the movie had been passed by Fox and the BBC, all artists with main speaking parts were called back to view the rough print and to re-record all of their lines. The aim was to compile 'clean' soundtracks (no background noise) that could be added to the master print and blended in with the music and sound effects. Such a process is called ADR dubbing.

Daphne Ashbrook, Eric Roberts and Paul McGann were called in for their ADR sessions at Universal Studios in Los Angeles on 11 April. Present as well was Geoffrey Sax, to coach them through their lines. Basically they just had to lip-synch their own performances, but there were other duties as well. McGann had to record opening and closing voice-overs for the movie (even though the latter would be dropped during editing) despite suffering a bad cold. Geoffrey Sax supplied clucking noises for the escaped chickens, and did a credible impression of a Dalek intoning "Exterminate" simply because none of the American sound crew knew what a Dalek sounded like.

Minor script corrections and polishes were applied at this stage too. A long shot of the Master and Chang Lee at the ITAR building was overdubbed with Roberts' line about needing to find a ambulance, to explain the deletion of a whole scene where they stole just such a vehicle, and are seen driving it in their very next scene.

Segal used the ADR session to correct a mistake, pointed out to him by 'Gallifrey' convention Organiser, Shaun Lyon, where the Doctor alludes to Time Lords having twelve lives. As Lyon rightly pointed out, Time Lords have twelve regenerations, ergo thirteen lives.

ADR sessions with the Canadian actors took place in Vancouver between 18 and 20 April, again with Sax supervising the sessions.

Sound effects and special sounds were produced on another piece of specialist audio kit called a Foley. As well as being the tool used to dub on stock atmospheric sounds (a busy street, a waterfront, a wild party), Foley would be used to multi-track in sounds of massed gun-fire, for example, car engine noise, or add reverberated ambience to library stock sounds like the sonic screwdriver being used underneath the console.

It was also used to synthesise certain effects. The sound engineers, for instance, took Brian Hodgson's TARDIS dematerialisation noise and segued in harmonised and variably pitched wind tunnel howling breezes to create, literally, a more 'wheezing and groaning' sound for the ship in flight.

As well as Hodgson's Radiophonic Workshop dematerialisation sound, the BBC also licensed Universal to use various TARDIS control room bleeps and whirrs, the buzz of the sonic screwdriver and the sonorous 'bongs' of the cloister bell.

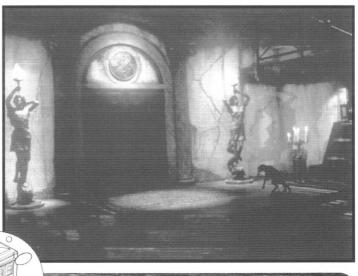

Cuts

Due to the way it was filmed, there were very little in the way of post production edits performed on the movie for timing or artistic reasons. Scenes such as the Master and Chang Lee stealing an ambulance, their initial detention by security guards at ITAR, and the Master's venom attack on an armed security detachment had been lost during filming. Whenever this had happened Matthew Jacobs was kept informed so he could pen bridging dialogue, to cover up plot holes, either for adding to subsequent days' filming shoots, or as dubbed voice-overs in Post Production. Filming with a multi-camera set-up was standard practice for American dramas. That way, if a bit of bridging dialogue was needed, the Director would select a long shot and add the dub there, knowing that viewers would not spot that lips were not moving in synch to the words.

On Monday 11 March BBC Worldwide received a rough viewing print of the movie. Of primary concern to the Producers and department heads were the levels of graphical violence present in some of the sequences leading up to and including the seventh Doctor's shooting. That concern escalated even more when, two days later, a maniac with guns shot dead sixteen children in Dunblane, Scotland, an event that triggered a huge public outcry over gun controls in the UK. Urgent memos were sent to Segal and Sax in the USA recommending cutting back some of the graphical content of the gunplay scenes.

A revised print, containing a lot of the stock footage, GCI and effects content, was sent to the BBC for approval just after Easter. By and large it was passed though a feeling persisted that the morphant snake, when seen rearing up and scouting its surroundings, still looked rather "cartoonish". Requests were made to trim back on full shots of the creature. A subsequent edit was signed-off by the BBC (though Jo Wright was unhappy that her Executive Producer credit had been moved to the end titles) and passed to the British Board of Film Classification so they could clear the video for release.

The BBFC, however, still had reservations about the gunplay elements. If they passed it as is for video it would need to have '15' certificate, and that would preclude the BBC from being able to screen it on TV before the nine o'clock watershed.

Hastily Geoffrey Sax was asked to re-edit the movie again for the UK so that a '12' certificate could be granted. This he did during the on-line edit of 22 April - when the title sequences were added - deleting shots of bullets spattering across the TARDIS, lingering shots of Chang Lee's associates being gunned down, and some of the Doctor's 'death throes' in hospital

Nominally the movie was completed on Thursday 2 May, ready for its US Press showing the following week. But some tweaks were still applied in the run-up to transmission. Most notable of these were further deletions to the Doctor being shot, and two sequences where the Master snaps Miranda and, later, Chang Lee's necks. In these latter cases it was the sound effects of their necks being snapped that the censors removed.

Transmission

Broadcasts of Doctor Who, the Movie were accompanied by a blitz of publicity and hype quite unparalleled in the show's history. Extracts from the Electronic Press Kit were stripped and compiled into features about the programme. There was a trailer feature in the US syndicated Turner Entertainment Report the same night, Sunday 15 May, as Sci-Fi Buzz included a 20minute documentary about the making of the movie on the Sci-Fi Channel. The documentary, titled The Making of Doctor Who was contemporary enough to include vox-pop sound-bites from luminaries such as Alan Yentob, Gary Gillatt, John Nathan-Turner and others at the BAFTA premiere on Monday 13 May.

The shops did their bit too as a flood of publications was launched two days later. Gary Russell's 200-plus page novelisation came out in paperback from BBC Books. Produced to very tight timescales the book's content was drawn from a shooting script, with additional pages faxed over as changes were made. Eight pages of colour photographs filled out the middle of the book and the cover reused one of these images below the silver-embossed Doctor Who logo

There were eight pages of colour stills in Doctor Who - the official script of the film by Matthew Jacobs, which likewise drew on a production rather than a transmission script for its source. Panini weighed in with their TV movie special magazine, bringing to an apex three months of solid coverage of the movie's production.

Minus 1' 6" of footage the video from BBC Worldwide was released five days ahead of the movie's UK TV transmission on Monday 27 May 1996. For a complete print of the show viewers had to wait until CIC Video in Hong Kong brought out an NTSC laserdisc (with Chinese subtitles) around Christmas 1996. There was an even longer wait for the uncut DVD from BBC Worldwide. which came out in 2001. For audiophiles a pair of 'talking book' audio cassettes were released in June 1997, with Paul McGann reading an abridged version of Gary Russell's novel.

By then Doctor Who had returned to the wilderness. Fox had advised Philip Segal as early as June 1996 that they were not pursuing options on any further programmes and series. In July work began on trashing the TARDIS set components at Burnaby. Universal Studios allowed their rights to make future Doctor Who productions lapse at the end of 1997.

Thereafter the fire of Doctor Who's canons flared in different directions. In 1999 Big Finish, a company founded by Gary Russell and Jason Haigh-Ellery, launched their successful foray into the world of new Doctor Who dramas on cassette and CD. That same year an acclaimed Doctor Who spoof, The Curse of Fatal DEATH' fronted the BBC's Red Nose Day charity telethon.

Paul McGann surfaced as the Doctor again in a web-cast adaptation of Douglas Adams' Shada, broadcast on BBCi in 2003, before handing over the role to his Withnail partner, Richard E Grant for the Cosgrove-Hall animated production, commissioned for the programme's 40th anniversary in November 2003.

Trivia

As his personal souvenir Philip Segal got to keep the miniature TARDIS prop built for the TV movie.

A voice-over by Paul McGann was recorded for the end of the TV movie, but it was dropped in favour of the humorous "Not again" remark. A different opening narration was recorded by Gordon Tipple, who appears briefly as the caged 'Old Master', telling of the events leading up the Doctor's possession of the casket, but from the Master's perspective.

The movie was never officially titled 'The Enemy Within'. This was a title suggested as how fans might like to catalogue the production, voiced by Philip Segal to delegates gathered at the ManoptiCon convention in Manchester over Easter, 1996. The title has since appeared in some TV listings, notably those relating to UK Gold screenings.

Continuity

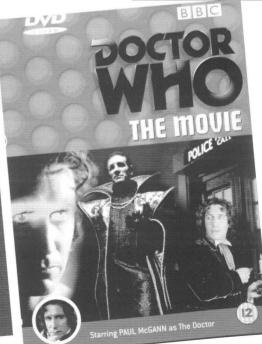

While a great many Doctor Who scripts and tapes were used as reference by Segal, Jacobs and Leekley, the three most used for research purposes were SPEARHEAD FROM SPACE, THE INVASION OF TIME and THE DEADLY ASSASSIN

The destination dial on the TARDIS control panel featured a number of planet names familiar to Doctor Who viewers, including Sarn (PLANET OF FIRE), Manussa (SNAKE-DANCE), Argolis (THE LEISURE HIVE) and Calufrax (THE PIRATE PLANET).

TELEVISION

New 'Who'

low will the cult-favorite Doctor Who"—returning in a wo-hour TV movie-fare in he hands of the network that ave us "Married...With hildren"?

'age 10

Audience

Strictly speaking the eighth Doctor's single outing in 1996 was not the first Doctor Who TV movie. That honour belongs to the joint BBC/ABC (Australia) venture in 1983, more commonly known as THE FIVE DOCTORS. On its first broadcast on 25 November The FIVE DOCTORS pulled in a rating of 7.7 millions viewers and was the 57th highest placed programme of the week. It was not as high as BBC chiefs had hoped, but the figure was on par with Peter Davison's era as a whole, reflecting a decade of sliding audiences that have since been variously attributed to factors like the arrival of video games, VCRs, Channel 4 and, most bizarrely, a perceived boredom with the medium of television among younger generations

Set against these metrics Paul McGann's 90-minute spe cial compares rather well, in terms of UK statistics. 9.08 million tuned in on 27 May 1996, making in the week's 9th most watched programme. That in itself is an impressive figure, even if the trend for continued audience decline during thirteen years is ignored for now. 9.08 million is very high for a Doctor Who episode shown in late Spring, when evenings are lighter and less people are content to stay indoors and "watch the box". Add to that factors of half-term week, a warm and (for a change) fairly dry Bank Holiday, plus the attendant Bank Holiday distractions of people being away, wrestling with barbecues or playing 'Count the lampost' on British motorways.

Undoubtedly the '96 TV movie was aided by a huge and very slick promotional campaign that began the day that Paul McGann was finally confirmed as the regent Doctor in early January. That announcement, plastered across every newspaper and news bulletin nation-wide, effectively ended six years of Press speculation about the future of the series and the identity of the actor to succeed Sylvester McCoy. There was surely more than one Features sub-editor who felt that the strap-line of the new movie should more accurately have read, "He's back ... and it's about bloody time"! The British media's overall affection for Doctor Who continued to fuel interest in the movie throughout February, March and April with production reports, photographs of McGann's costume, whiffs of rows on set, even rumours of new series guaranteeing column inches in the tabloids, TV journals and especially the Radio Times

The video's release. delayed for a week for additional editing, heavily upped the promotion stakes. Ads in the Press abounded, late night special openings in several stores were arranged, and suddenly nearly every blue chip video retailer in the country had a prominent dump bin installed in its foyer, brimming with copies of the silverembossed VHS tape.

One other, and wholly unplanned, event in May helped tip the scales even more for Doctor Who's return. Just a week before the movie's transmission Doctor Who mark III, Jon Pertwee, passed away, prompting massive media coverage of an actor beloved of many generations of TV viewers. His role as Worzel Gummidge was notably featured but the vast majority of the coverage centred on his part in Doctor Who Tributes to Jon Pertwee dovetailed with a final week of media campaigning for Paul McGann's new incarnation with interviews, publicity features and promo stills abounding, culminating in cover appearances on the TV Times, as well as Radio Times, for the week commencing 25 May.

The TV movie's 9.08 million viewers places it at approximately position number 44 out of 160 first-run Doctor Who adventures, just above The Keys of Marinus (9.07 million) and below stories that are predominantly from darker evening

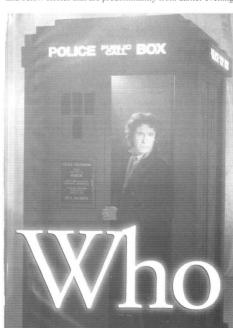

close MOVIE (CC) TUES. 7 PM 32

DOCTOR WHO

The low-budget BBC sci-fi series comes to Fox as a big-budget made-for-TV movie. While this 1996 film is relatively faithful to the long-running cult classic, knowledge of the complex Doctor Who mythology is not a prerequisite for viewing (but it is recommended). The plot follows the good Doctor (played by Sylvester McCoy and, later, Paul McGann) as he faces his archenemy, the Master, in San Francisco. It's the last day of 1999, and the Master (Eric Roberts) is planning to steal the Doctor's remaining lives-a scheme that also threatens the existence of time and space as we know it. Dr. Grace Holloway: Daphne Ashbrook. (2:00) [See the feature article on p. 22.]

Boo Who! The Doctor's finally run out of time

YOU loved it or you loathed it... either way, there's too much at stake for one man to give a thumbs up-or-down on BBC1's new Dr Who

So here's the family's verdict.

MUM: "I was so disappointed. Whatever this was, it wasn't Do Who." I'm sorry they ever got Hollywood involved...they've ruined his memory."

Marks: Two out of 10.

Top Doe: Jon Pertwee.

Top Doe: Jon Pertwee.

TASHA, 17: "Paul
McGann was fair enough, particularly for a US audience. But you don't expect sex appeal from the Doctor...tis like faneying your grandad!
"I didn't like sidekick
Daphne Ashbrook – she wasn't comrining, nor was she the high-powered 90s woman they aimed to os worna.

ake her."

Marks: One out of 10.

Top Doc: Tom Baker.

"The TIM, 13: "The ucked-up signature tune

MOVE OVER DALEK! McGann and Daphne Ashbrook

Marks: Four out of 10. Top Doc: Tom Baker. NIECE, 28: "I liked Paul McGann...anyone's better than Sylvester McCoy! Who was different at least it's not a medical na or cop show Marks: six out of 10. Top Doc: Pertwee/Baker.

AND ME? Sorry, belong within Dalek-range of the Tardis. The plot was poor and I happen to like latex monsters! Marks: Two out of 10.

Who phenomena. It also rated a four-page star feature in the nationally published TV Guide and was heavily trailed in the run-up to Tuesday evening.

Sadly the movie's ratings in America fell short of expectations. Average Tuesday night figures tended to give Fox 11% of the audience gross. 15% was what Fox were aiming for, and 18% would have guaranteed funding for further movies or even a series. But, set against a first-run episode of Frasier and a significant episode of Roseanne, Doctor Who could only manage 5.5 million viewers. It was the 75th most watched programme of the week, but only grabbed 9% of that night's audience.

Within weeks Fox had withdrawn its interest in future Doctor Who, opting instead to finance a third series of Sliders by way of keeping in with the science-fiction market. It was a blow to Philip Segal, and a blow to the BBC/Universal partnership. They retained the rights to make new Doctor Who programmes but could find no replacement buyers in a market dominated by the principle that, "You're only as good as your previous success

The final nail in the coffin came on 3 October 1996 when

INSPIRED: McGann must be the sexiest Doctor ever

Stylish Doctor McGann shows us who's boss

Shows us v

I CAME to the new Doctor Who full of prejudice. Especially when they abandoned that wonderfully spooky music by the BBC's legendary Radiophonic Workshop. Couldn't the new co-production team have found a way of combining that unique sound with a full lush orchestral arrangement? And what other new-fangled horrors would the Hollywood input inflict on us dedicated fans? Fears were unjustified. Apart from trying to make the new American audience feel at home by setting the first adventure in San Francisco, which really ruled out much possibility of the Daleks turning up, the new Who is super. The expanded Tardis is inspired, Julia Roberts's brother Eric is a sinisterly handsome Master and Paul McCann is quite splendid as the new Doctor. There is no sense here of an actor camping it up in order to find the surreal sci-fi evel. He plays it with utter seriousness and yet has an enviably light touch. Stylish (Who's new look was borrowed from enviably light touch. Stylish (Who's new look was borrowed from someone who was going to a fancy dress party as Wild Bill Hickock), dashing, capable of being both intense and funny, he must also be the sexiest Who ever. I have a feeling the third Doctor, Jon Pertwee, that other master of style to whose memory this film was dedicated, would have approved.

style to whose memory this film was dedicated, would have approved.

COMPARED to the Who crew, the actors in Cold
Lazarus did not seem so at home with the pseudo-scientific jargon. Some of the lines in Dennis Potter's futuristic bad dream sounded plain silly, and the cast looked self-conscious.

What a literally mind-blowing idea is at the centre of the series, ideas, random thoughts could be translated straight into visual images. It will probably come une not of these days. And then what glass, what strange TV series we will all produce, translated straight from our feverish minds on to the several. At the moment my one to read our series of the series of the moment my one to read our series of the series. our feverish minds on to the screen: At the moment my own bad dreams are dominated by one image. Albert Finney's disconnected frozen head, covered in thick hoar frost, flickering, twitching and flinching like someone in torment. Amazing.

Conservative candidate, and self-confessed Doctor Who, fan Tim Collins seized an opportunity to speak to the BBC's Chief Executive of Broadcasting, Will Wyatt, at their party conference. Quizzed if the BBC would be prepared to work without a US co-partner Wyatt replied that a solo funded Doctor Who risked looking 'cheap' without American money. Asked then if any more Doctor Who episodes would be made, he said emphatically, "No. We can't afford it!"

It was never about time after all. It was about ular drama" by public vote in a BBC awards ceremony, trouncing fellow contender and number one rated programme, EastEnders. To be fair, UK Press reviews of the movie were mixed. Maureen Paton, writing in next day's Daily Express, cheered that, "...at last we have a grown-up, high-tech Doctor Who periods and TV eras when audience numbers were higher.

So if the operation to reanimate Doctor Who was such a success, why did the patient die as far as further TV series were concerned? After all, just five months later, Doctor Who would be feted as the nation's "all-time favourite pop-in Paul McGann", while her counterpart, Max Davidson, on the Daily Mail moaned, "Seeing the TARDIS again, in a vulgar American reincarnation, was too depressing for words". The Times too was less than praising. "If the series is to return," pondered Matthew Bond, "It will need stronger scripts than this simplistic offering.

Arguably Serena Mackesy of The Independent offered the most balanced verdict. Acclaiming Paul McGann's Doctor ("He has the perfect touch: the part requires a theatricality, an ability to ham it up that has become rare in this era of naturalism and method ... Very impressive"), she was damning of the production as a whole ("It quickly became clear that the Americans had lost the plot ... the main word that sprang to mind was 'derivative'").

As feedback coalesced a split developed between the general public, who, by and large, had liked the movie - as the sample of letters printed in Radio Times a few weeks later testified, and BBC programme makers who sided with critiques in the broadsheets. And as the next round of internal shake-ups within the Corporation took place, those responsible for commissioning the Doctor Who pilot in the first were moved to new jobs.

Yet one truth remained constant. Just as the BBC had been unable to afford an expensive Doctor Who movie alone in 1983, it could not fly solo on any similar ventures in 1996 and beyond. Almost regardless of what the BBC thought of Philip Segal's effort, the weight of decision rested thousands of miles away in Los Angeles

In America publicity for 'Dr Who - a Fox original movie' had been forged around Eric Roberts, whose dark visage in even darker sunglasses took centre stage in the majority of posters and Press publicity. Even the strap-line was geared towards emphasising the show's action-adventure elements. 'They've crash-landed on Earth, and only one of them can leave alive" trumpeted the by-lines. "Let the race begin".

Promotion for the movie's 14 May debut on American network television was nowhere near as extensive as in Britain, but it had its Press champions, notably Steve Hockensmith of the Chicago Tribune broadsheet who devoted a whole page of the 12 May Sunday edition to looking at the whole Doctor

References Books

JACOBS, Matthew: Doctor Who: The Script of the Film (BBC, 1996) RUSSELL, Gary & SEGAL, Philip: Doctor Who: Regeneration (BBC, 1999) RUSSELL, Gary: Doctor Who: The Novel of the Film (BBC, 1996)

Magazines

Build High for Happiness 1 (feature) Capitol Spires 9 (Review), 10 (Letters) Celestial Toyroom 243 (Discontinuity Guide supplement)

Circus 5 (Commentary, Discontinuity Guide supplement, review)

Cloister Bell 2 (Details of censorship, review)

Continuing Mission 5 (News stories), 6 (Review)

Cult Times 6 (Filming); 7 (Photos); 8 (feature); 9 (Review); 10 (UK Cuts) Dreamwatch 5 (News stories) 9 (Philip Segal Interview); 16 (News stories); 1 (feature), 18 (McGann Casting); 20 (Behind-the-Scenes feature, Sylvester McCoy interview); 21 (Paul McGann & Philip Segal interviews); 22 (Details of censorship, Novel review, review, Script book review); 23 (ratings report, letters); 25 (Letters)

Doctor Who Magazine 254 (Yee Jee Tso interview)

Fast Return Special 1 Into the Future 1 (Review) Metamorph II 6 (Review); 7 (Review); 8.5 (Review)

November Spawned a Monster (Commentary) Quango 2 (Review)

Rumours 5/1 (Amblin correspondence) Sci-Fi Entertainment (feature); 3/1 (feature) SFX 9 (McGann Casting); 12 (Feature); 13 (Behind-the-Scenes feature);

13 (Photos); 14 (Review); 15 (Letters, ratings report); 22 (Photos) Skonnos 22 (Review)

Starburst 207 (News stories); 210 (McGann Casting); 211 (Filming); 212 (Philip Segal Interview); 213 (Behind-the-Scenes photos, commentary. Eric Robert interview, location reports); 214 (Daphne Ashbrook interview, feature, novel review, Paul McGann interview, Peter Ware (Design) interviews Philip Segal interview, review, script book review, Tony Dow (VFX) interview, Yee Jee Tso interview, Geoffrey Sax interview); 215 (Geoffrey Sax interview cont, letters, review, score review) Starburst Special 28 (Daphne Ashbrook interview, Paul McGann interview); 30 (feature)

Starlog 227 (feature)

Stone Circle 4 (Review, novel review, script book review)

Strange Happenings 1 (Press summary) The Doctor's Recorder 7 (Review); 9 (feature)

The Dr Who Movie Special Thermal Lance 30 (Review); 32 (Details of censorship)

Timelines 43 (Review); 44 (feature) TV Zone 77 (Filming); 78 (Paul McGann interview); 79 (Commentary, Daphne Ashbrook interview); 80 (Gary Russell interview, letters, Matthew Jacobs interview. Novel review, review, script book review); 81 (Philip Segal Interview); 92 (Audio book review)

TV Zone Special 22 (Location Reports)

THE TV MOVIE

One-Off Serial 159

The Doctor Paul McGann The Old Doctor Sylvester McCoy Written by Matthew Jacobs Directed by Geoffrey Sax

Cast The Master

Dr Grace Holloway Chang Lee Salinger Dr Swift

Wheeler Curtis Pete Gareth Miranda Motorcycle Cop Professor Wagg Security Guard News Anchors

Fric Roberts

Daphne Ashbrook Yee Jee Tso John Novak Michael David Simms Catherine Lough Delores Drake William Sasko Jeremy Radick Eliza Roberts Bill Croft Dave Hurtubise loel Wirkunnen Dee Jay Jackson Joanna Piros Mi-Jung Lee

Gordon Tipple

Small roles:

The Old Master Dalek Voices Lee's Friends

Geoffrey Sax Dean Choe Michael Ching Chase Car Driver Lloyd Adams Daryl Quan Chinese Gangsters Bryon Lawson Johnny Mah

Drivers

Audience Member Motorcycle Cop Cop in Car at ITAR Stunt Cop Stunt Double/7th Doctor Stunt Doubles/The Doctor

Stunt Double/Grace Stunt Double/Chang Lee

Stunt Doubles/The Master

Stunt Drivers

Crew

Edited by Production Designer

Richard Hudolin Director of Photography Glen McPherson Music Additional Music

Ron James Danny Groseclose Executive Producer Ron James Ron James Executive Producer Bill Stewart Executive Producer for the BBC

Mike Langlois

Charles Andre

Dawn Stouffer Michael Crestjo

Fred Perron

Alex Green Charles Andre Jacob Ripp David Jacox

Patrick Lussier

Beth Haynson-Ayer Trish Robinson Casting by

Visual Effects Producer

Co-Producer Production Manager

First Assistant Director

Second Assistant Director

Extras Casting James Forsyth UK Casting Consultants John and Ros Hubbard Costume Designer

Jori Woodham Art Director Property Master Bridget McGuire Dan Sissons Set Decorator Cynthia Lewis Construction Co-Ordinator Derick MacLend

John Debney

John Sponsler Louis Febre

Philip David Segal

Jo Wright Tony Dow Matthew Jacobs

Fran Rosati

Patrick Leung

David Klohn

Alex Beaton

Camera Operator Randal Platt Greg Fox First Assistant Camera

SecondAssistant Camera Nick Watson Drew Davidson Special Effects Co-Ordinator

Gary Paller Additional Editing Daris Ellerman Key Grip Make-Up Dave Gordon Joann Fowler Hairstylist Julie McHaffie Gordon W Anderson Ed Nesling Sound Mixer Location Manager Script Supervisor Jessica Clothier Head Accountant Beverley Wiens Head Painter Barry Kootchin Production Co-Ordinator Sandra Palmer Stunt Co-Ordinators Fred Perron

Transportation Co-Ordinator

Dennis Houser Driver Cantain John Oliver Visual Effects

Northwest Imaging & FX Visual Effects Supervisor

Visual Effects Co-Ordinator

Marush Kushniruk Sound Supervisor

Jacqueline Cristianini Stills Photography Joe Ledereer Doane Gregory

First Aid/Craft Service Jim Rankin Technicians

Local 891 Vancouver Cameras Clairmont

Filming

4th January 1996 15th – 19th January 1996 22nd – 25th January 1996 29th January – 2nd February 1996

h – 10th February 1996 h – 16th February 1996 5 19th - 21st February 1996

Transmission

Tuesday14th May 1996 8,00pm, FOX US 8.00pm, FOX Monday 27th May 1996 8.30pm, BBC1 (8.30 – 9.55 84'39") UK UK REPEAT Saturday 13th November

11.05pm, BBC2 (85'46")

Audience, Position and Ratings

5.5 million, Share, 9% 9.08 million, Share, 35% US: UK rpt: 1.4 million, Share, n/k

Final Issue: The Legacy

POLICE TELEPHONE FOR USE OF PUBLIC

ADVICE AND ASSISTANCE OBTAINABLE IMMEDIATELY

OFFICERS AND CARS
RESPOND TO

